WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

DAME Mode has destined the plump woman to utter extinction, unless she can so disguise herself as to give at least a semblance of the swan-like slimness now considered so necessary. The newest gowns are more sheath-like than ever, even the flare at the bottom being depressed considerably. While this mode is especially graceful, the gown, built on these lines, is considerably more of an undertaking for the amateur dressmaker, than has been the case for several seasons, there being no superfluous fullness which might conceal any little discrepancies. The contour of the fashionable skirt is, this season, very seldom broken by any, save flat trimmings, the flounce skirts which were so in evidence last season are altogether passe. One of the most novel skirts I have seen has no opening at the back, fitted very closely over the hips, the fullness springing out from the point where the placket usually ceases. It is gotten into through its opening at the left side, which is fastened snugly with tiny buttons set close together. Gold baby pins are used to close the skirt at the back, successfully too. Rare indeed are the skirts which are not fastened at the back with either button or pin—even when neither are used the inverted pleat fits over the "turnure" like a glove. Of course this plainness at the back demands a spring from the waist, which having been denied to many, by nature, may be supplied by a small bustle; but this must be very carefully fitted so as to fill the exact hollow without making one larger. The large majority of the new skirts are drop skirts, this being the case both with soft goods and the heavier stuffs used for tailor-made gowns.

There seems to be a decided preference for softly-fitting bodices for almost every style of gown, save that of the strictly tailorfied. The blouse, however, has almost entirely disappeared from the horizon, the favorite bodice I refer to, is usually provided with an easily fitted lining of silk, over which the thin wool or silk is drawn softly into shape, the only really fitted places being the under arm pieces. One lovely waist I have in mind, which by the way is of French origin, has the body of heavy silk in inch square blocks of green and brown, matching the skirt, fitting comfortably, over which is a loose, blouse-like arrangement of black chenille caught together in squares. Across the shoulders, back and front, like a bertha, are pendants of rich yellow lace, attached by small roses of lace embroidery. This bodice exemplifies the adoption by the French of comfortably fitting garments, as being more truly graceful and becoming than any which confines and so often distorts the figure.

Very few changes in sleeves are noted; they are scarcely smaller than those of last season, the only addition whatever in their makeup being at the wrist, which is still worn very long and drooping over the hand. This is far too becoming a mode to be easily dropped and one is perfectly safe in lavishing all sorts of decorations on this part of the bodice. A pretty sleeve to be worn with a skirt buttoned at the back and a bodice fastened in the same manner, fits perfectly snug, but without cramping the arm, is buttoned from the top of the shoulder to the hand. Sleeves of evening gowns when of lace or thin material, very often are provided with thumb straps, when no gloves are worn.

Shirt waists show small modifications from last year's style, with the exception of use of material, which does not provide for the bayadere stripe. The plainest shirt waists are of course always in the best taste, though fancy runs riot in all sorts of embellishments. The white shirt waists are to be very much in evidence and are this year exceedingly dainty owing to the amount of hand work put upon them, and it is no uncommon thing to see the entire waist made of hand hemstitched tucks or drawn-work.

Spring millinery is always fascinating, in as much as it always sets forth novel ideas, and this season is no disappointment in that line. My lady fair smiles sweetly upon hats tilting over the nose, or those flaring off the face; indeed, her affections were never more divided, both styles being bewitching and both usually suited to her, provided she arranges her hair afresh for each change of hat. The flaring hat can be worn successfully only with the pompadour, large or small to suit the face, and this mode of hair dressing is by no means passe, although the parted hair is again in high favor, waved loosely. For the pompadour there are the "rats" so necessary in giving correct bouffancy, and, when one's hair is thin on the top, the clever hairdresser has provided a waved covering of hair to be rolled over the "rat," a substitute for one's scanty locks.

A smart little hat is just finished, in scarlet straw, rolling sharply back from the face, the narrow brim at the back sloping over the hair, simply trimmed with slender curving wings of black, twists and knots of black velvet ribbon, and cut steel buckles. A pretty capote is built of cerise pink taffeta draped softly with embroidered white mousseline de soie and further embellished by a bunch of rich velvet roses, in violet, set at the left side. Crowns of all sorts of hats are made of leaves set over-lapping one another, with good effect.

The nattiest gown I have seen this spring was an Eton jacket, a style which has regained its old-time popularity. The material was smooth, light-weight broadcloth in a pale biscuit color, the skirt and edges of the jacket richly embroidered with a darker shade of heavy silk cord.

An attractive evening frock is set forth here, of soft china silk in creamy white, having an overdress of creamy lace, and soft bodice of the same, the one-sided bertha being of canary velvet edged with quillings of orange mousseline de soie. A wreath of yellow roses covers one shoulder, while a large knot of yellow tulle, with long scarf ends falls from the shoulder.

Uncle Sam's Napery and Laundry Bill.

THE number of towels needed by the department clerks in Washington is something enormous, and the supply of these necessaries of the toilet kept by Uncle Sam for their use would fill a fair-sized warehouse. The Treasury Department alone owns seven thousand towels, and nearly two thousand of them are used every day. The Interior Department proper has two thousand, and uses six hundred and fifty each day. The Pension office soils four hundred and fifty towels every day, and the Agricultural Department one hundred and ten. Then there are the Bureau of Education, the Geological Survey, the Census, the Patent Office, the Labor Bureau, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, all belonging to the Interior Department, and all materially adding to the number of towels used daily. The State Department has, of course, the smallest number of clerks, but uses more towels in proportion to the number of clerks than any other two departments. The Navy and the War Departments, too, are as lavish as the State Department in their use of towels.

All these soiled towels are laundered by contract at an average cost of thirty-five cents a hundred towels.

A Good Complexion

Depends on Good Digestion.

This is almost an axiom, although usually we are apt to think that cosmetics, face powders, lotions, fancy soaps, etc., are the secret for securing a clear complexion.

But all these are simply superficial assistants. It is impossible to have a good complexion unless the digestive organs perform their work properly; unless the stomach by properly digesting the food taken into it furnishes an abundance of pure blood a good complexion is impossible.

This is the reason so many ladies are using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, because they promptly cure any stomach trouble, and they have found out that perfect digestion means a perfect complexion and one that does not require cosmetics and powders to enhance its beauty.

Many ladies diet themselves or deny themselves many articles of food solely in order to keep their complexion clear.

When Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are used no such dieting is necessary. Take these tablets and eat all the good, wholesome food you want and you need have no fear of indigestion nor the sallow, dull complexion which nine women out of ten have, solely because they are suffering from some form of indigestion.

Bear in mind that beauty proceeds from good health, good health results from perfect digestion and we have advanced the best argument to induce every man or woman to give this splendid remedy a trial.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be found in drug stores and cost but 50 cents per package. They are prepared by the F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

If there is any derangement of the stomach or bowels they will remove it and the resultant effects are good digestion, good health and a clear, bright complexion. Ask your druggist for the tablets and a free book on stomach diseases.

Among Our New Possessions.

tification. In many states the legislatures adopted resolutions instructing their senators to vote for ratification. They believed this action to be not only a patriotic duty, but a measure demanded by the highest and best interests of the nation. The leading minds of the country in the great professions and at the great universities and centers of learning, united in their demands that ratification of the peace treaty, pure and simple, was the one thing that could set our country right before the world. After that we could take the next step toward justice and national honor, whatever that step may be.

With the treaty ratified we were still in a condition of truce pending open war with Spain. No one in America wishes that war again opened. We believe that everybody in the United States wanted peace; that peace lies along one straight, plain path, the path of ratification.

The people of the country looked to their servants, the senators of the United States, to ratify the pending treaty of peace, and were not disappointed when the treaty was ratified by a vote of 57 in favor with 27 against. This was on Monday, February 5th. It is more than probable that the necessary two-thirds vote would not have been obtained had not Aguinaldo's forces assumed the offensive on the previous Saturday. This action proved the defeat of the opposition and gave enough of the wavering vote to secure the requisite number for a majority.

It has always seemed that no matter what might have been the opinions of the opposing senators on the future of the Philippines, there could be but one thing to do relative to the ratification of the treaty. Until this had been done, final or decisive action was impossible. The people throughout the country have learned to implicitly rely on President McKinley and stood willing to trust him in the matter, fully believing that he would take time and would not act until he was fully informed and then for the best interest both of the Filipinos and the American people. It is always unsafe to form rash conclusions and take hasty action where but little information on the subject has been obtained. Last May a great majority of our readers could hardly have told where the Philippine islands were, and it is senseless at this early day to think any of us have information enough to state what will be best as the final policy of our government.

In the heroic deeds of the Manila battle was the taking of the Santa Anna church by a daring charge of American soldiers. The Filipinos, like most Orientals, will fight in entrenchments; but do not like field battles. Most of the stone-built churches around Manila had been pierced by musketry firing. Successively these were captured by the Americans who drove the insurgents from these forts.

After hearing quantities of testimony the War Commission has handed in a report of its findings. While many ultra partisan papers have denounced it as "whitewashing," we feel that the members of the court are men of the highest honor and that whatever verdict they may have found will be in accordance with the facts as found by them. It is always much easier to make charges against people than to prove them. When the full findings of the court are made public, they will undoubtedly show themselves to be founded on good testimony and good reasoning. One of the most unfortunate episodes has been the remarkable utterance of Commissary-General Eagan and his prompt Court-martial. Gen. Eagan in his testimony before the Commission called Gen. Miles, the head of the Army, a liar in several ways. The public utterance of such a phrase against a superior officer called for immediate trial. A court headed by Gen. Wesley Merritt met and promptly found him guilty but recommended mercy. Accordingly President McKinley commuted his sentence to retirement for six years. Few of those who think the judgment not severe enough have any idea of the humiliation this sentence conveys to a man who has been so long in the service. Considering that criticism had driven him almost into an unbalanced state, undoubtedly the sentence was sufficiently severe.

The Home Market club of Boston gave the largest dinner ever held, in honor of the President on February 16th. The immense hall was packed with an immense audience of typical New England men, who applauded every utterance of President McKinley. The event had been watched with the deepest interest for it was realized that Mr. McKinley was to make the first public talk since the ratification of the Peace treaty.

The President said in substance that no man yet knew enough about the conditions to say what should be our final policy but that through no desire on our part the islands had come into our possession. As COMFORT has repeatedly pointed out those that criticise offer no solution of the problem. But Mr. McKinley in eloquent and well-chosen words told that we would not shirk responsibilities; that while we harbor no Imperialistic designs we intend that until ready for a permanent government ready and willing to stand alone, the United States proposes to hold the Islands in peace and order and clear the pathway of civilization in them. When Congress and the American people shall say what is best, then the administration will act; until then America will preserve peace and order. These and many other things were said by Mr. McKinley and we advise every COMFORT reader seeking knowledge on the subject, to obtain this speech and read every word of it, to gain a perfect idea of the tremendous problems our nation is called upon to solve.

This clear statement of Mr. McKinley and endorsed by the members of his cabinet, has been published all over the world. The American press as a whole cordially endorses the statement. Abroad different countries view the situation from different standpoints, but as a whole the press everywhere favors the position our President has taken relative to the Philippines.

OSTRICH FARMING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ONE of the paying industries of California is that of ostrich farming. A few years ago ostriches were thought to belong exclusively to Africa, and it is only within the past twelve years that it has been found that they can be kept in this country.

Ostriches for breeding purposes are worth five hundred dollars per pair, although one suitable for a circus can be bought for one hundred dollars.

Mr. and Mrs. Ostrich are a very devoted and exclusive couple. It matters not whether their mating was their own affair or was managed by their owner, as soon as he has received his wife Mr. Ostrich claims her as his own, and is ready to fight for her to his last breath. Visitors to an ostrich farm will observe that, in order to preserve the peace, alleys six feet in width separate breeding pairs from each other.

When this loving couple have decided that the time has come for them to raise a family the male leads his wife to a secluded spot, and, falling flat upon his breastbone, he proceeds to kick out the sand behind him until he has a hole a foot deep. Then he turns about and kicks the sand from the other end of the hole until it is about three feet in width and one in depth. When he has the hole or nest of a size to satisfy Madam Ostrich she takes possession of it and lays an egg therein. Every other day she repeats the process until she has twelve or fifteen of the great white globes beneath her. Then she proceeds to sit on them, and for forty-two days thereafter she may be seen patiently squatting over them, her long legs trailing out behind her. In this work she is greatly assisted by the male, who "spells" her devotedly; but, manlike, he does his "sitting" at night when he would be squatting somewhere asleep where there were eggs to cover or not. From five in the afternoon to eight or nine in the morning he takes his turn on the nest, and again for an hour or so at noon.

When the first little chick announces that he wishes to "come out" his mother promptly assists him by crushing his shell gently with her breastbone. At last all are hatched, and a thrifty family of a dozen brown, fluffy baby ostriches, each the size of a pullet, reward their proud and happy parents. For a day or two they want no food, and only swallow pebbles and bits of stone, and by the time they are ready for better nourishment they are taken from their parents and placed in an alfalfa field. Here they grow like the weeds about them, a foot in a month in height, and at the end of six months they are ready to be placed in the common corral, and to eat from the community troughs the food furnished to the full-grown birds—sugar beets, grass and corn.

The feathers of the full-grown, male ostrich are far finer and more valuable than those of either the young one or the female. The feathers ripen every few months, and are worth about thirty dollars per plucking of each male bird. Once in nine months the bird is plucked, and the process is an interesting one to watch, although rather a dangerous one to the operators, as a kick from an ostrich is a serious matter. There is one saving clause in its effect, however. An ostrich can only kick forward, never backward, and he is also a "high kicker." Remembering these two things the men generally manage to keep out of the way of his formidable, two-toed foot. In catching an ostrich for plucking he is always approached from behind, and sometimes he leads his would-be captors a long, weary chase before he can be captured. Small dogs are of great assistance in this business; for, strange as it may seem, an ostrich is desperately afraid of a dog, and the smaller the dog the greater is his fear of him. Being, as has been said, a "high kicker," he cannot reach low enough to touch the little animal, and so has no weapon with which to fight him.

When the ostrich is caught he is taken into a small corral surrounded by a high board fence, a hood is drawn over his head and neck, and he is placed with his head in an angle of the corral fence. Here he is powerless to kick, and is held in place by a man, while the ripe black and white quills are cut from his wings with short, heavy shears. A stump four inches long is left by the shearer, and this is pulled out two months later to make room for the new feathers. After the shears have done their work the smaller feathers of the wings and the long white tail feathers are pulled and the work is finished. The body feathers are never taken. A gate in the corner of the corral in front of the ostrich is then opened, the hood is drawn from his head, and off he scoots like the wind, flapping his wings in high indignation at the treatment which he has received.

Anyone who chooses can keep ostriches. They are hardy birds, and require no more care than a horse or a cow. Their food, too, is comparatively inexpensive, as it consists of sugar beets, grass and corn; and they amply repay their owner for their care and keep.

$1,000 FOR A CERTAIN OLD COIN.

WHILE there are some people who have a vague idea that coins issued 100 or 1000 years ago are worth fabulous sums, yet very few know that coins issued only a few years ago are at a large premium. For instance, the silver dollars of 1895 and many of the earlier ones. The first Columbian half-dollar, issued 1892, sold for $1,000. All the half-dollars from 1879 to 1890 are at a premium, also Isabella quarters of 1893, the old issue of the quarters and half-dollars of 1853, twenty-cent pieces 1876 to 1878; five and three-cent pieces of 1877; last issue of the two-cent copper and three-cent silver pieces; first issue of the nickel cents, all gold dollars and three-dollar gold pieces; all Territorial and California coins from 1849 to 1880, and thousands of earlier American and Foreign coins, Canadian especially. There is also a premium on some coins with MINT MARKS O, S, C, D or CC; also on fractional currency, colonial, continental and Confederate bills and old POSTAGE STAMPS. THE GLOBE reports that a coin was found in Galveston worth $5,000. THE NEW YORK JOURNAL says that a cent was plowed up at Aurora, N. Y., worth $1,200, and that Mr. Castle paid $4,400 FOR A STAMP found at Louisville, Ky. THE WORLD says: "Many people have become wealthy by looking after old coins and stamps." THE HOME JOURNAL says: "Coin and stamp collecting is a profitable business, as there are but few in it. The Numismatic Bank buys from Agents all over the country, and pays them big sums." Coins that are very hard to find in one section are often easily found in others. A Boston baker sold 116 coppers for $6,915, 29 silver coins for $4,713, and 4 gold coins for $1,700, and others have done nearly as well. MR. F. W. AYER sold recently a lot of stamps, collected since 1892, to Stanley Gibbons for $250,000. THE COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL NEWS says: "The Numismatic Bank is not only the largest institution of its kind, but as reliable, safe and trustworthy to deal with as any National Bank. The enormous business done by them is the result of SQUARE DEALING and liberality." Send two stamps for our illustrated circular on rare coins and stamps, which may prove to be your stepping stone to wealth and independence. NUMISMATIC BANK, (Dept. C, Boston, Mass.

BIG FREE OFFER.

These models are gotten up to sell for $5.00 per set, but in order to introduce them quickly we will send one set of models to you free, all charges paid, so it won't cost you a cent to examine into the plan. The first idea was to send the models on receipt of one dollar, but many do not like to risk even one dollar without seeing the article even if sure of getting $5.00 worth—so it was decided to trust to the honesty of the sisters to either return the models or the small amount in cash required and rely on the good words to be spoken to advertise it to others. We thus give all who see this notice a chance to inspect the great system free of charge for the next thirty days, and an offer goes with the models whereby you can secure it entirely free and make much money and secure valuable premiums talking it up and introducing to others. Don't wait, act quick before our first lot is exhausted, send full name and complete address to

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

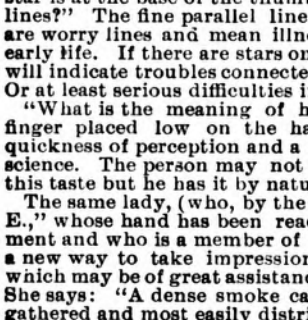
A LADY from one of the Western States writes to ask of whom our Palmistry Club consists. Everybody, my friend, who has had his or her hand read in this column, and everybody who has procured and studied a copy of our Palmistry Guide. I presume there are others who are glad to see this question answered. Remember, to belong to the "Comfort Palmistry Club" it is necessary to become identified with it by sending your hand for reading, or at least by getting and studying the Guide, first, of course, remembering to comply with the conditions.

The same lady asks several questions which will interest all who are studying palmistry. "Is there anything reliable in the sign, of which I have heard, of the interlacing the fingers to see which thumb naturally comes outside next the person?"

There is a groundwork of truth in all these signs. The person of strong character—especially one of great independence of character—will show it in his right hand; and in interlacing the fingers, the right thumb will naturally fall on the outside, while the more dependent disposition will show itself by throwing the left hand out. This is according to a principle of cheirosophy rather than by any particular value of this sign alone. By this it would seem that the person whose right thumb falls naturally on the outside will naturally dominate others, while the weaker character is shown by the left thumb; this is not infallible, however.

"What is the signification of a deep line running from the base of the thumb to the mount of Jupiter and terminating at the base of the first finger?" Great liberality and good fortune either through marriage or through friends. It is a lucky sign.

"What does it mean to have four parallel fine lines running from the base of the thumb to the life line under Jupiter? What if there is a star on one on the field of Mars? What if a star is at the base of the thumb on one of these lines?" The fine parallel lines, three or more, are worry lines and mean illness or trouble in early life. If there are stars on either end, they will indicate troubles connected with marriage. Or at least serious difficulties in love affairs.



"What is the meaning of having the little finger placed low on the hand?" It means quickness of perception and a leaning towards science. The person may not have developed this taste but he has it by nature.

The same lady, (who, by the way, is "Anchor E.," whose hand has been read in this department and who is a member of the club,) gives a new way to take impressions of the hands which may be of great assistance to some of you. She says: "A dense smoke can be most easily gathered and most easily distributed as well, by holding the paper over burning camphor gum. The best way is to finely crumble the gum thinly on a flat surface, as the larger the lumps the higher they blaze, thus endangering the paper. You can readily see that by spreading the crumbs out on a flat surface a larger surface of paper will take the smoke at once than if held over a single flame."

She also says that a fixatif can easily be made at home by putting a lump of gum shellac into a bottle containing alcohol to cut, which is quite an inexpensive way. Surely both these bits of information are valuable and I hope you will cut them out and paste them in your scrap-books, unless you do better than that and preserve all your back numbers of COMFORT and bind them up.

Now I have taken up so much of my allotted space in answering these questions, which I am sure are of value to every one in COMFORT'S Palmistry Club, that I shall have room for but two readings this month.

The first of these is "See More." He has a good hand denoting a strong, self-reliant character; one who will dare to go ahead with whatever seems right and best for him to do. He will be capable of great self-sacrifice and is generous in disposition. He has a good business hand and the most fortunate part of his life will come after the age of twenty-five and until fifty. He will make a good merchant, real estate dealer, insurance agent or will do well in any similar line. I should say those callings would be better than a professional career. He will live to be seventy or over, for although the life line is broken in his left hand it is all right in the other, and the right is the hand which denotes his life as he makes it; he will need to take especial care of himself between the ages of thirty and fifty, however. He will marry not far from thirty and will have a happy marriage. The line to which the accompanying letter refers as "descending from the heart line" is not so; I should read it as a line ascending to it, which puts a good meaning to it. It shows happiness and good luck somewhere about thirty—probably connected with his marriage. The broken heart-line I do not see repeated on the other hand in the impressions before me; if it is not in both hands it is not to be counted; if it is it may mean heart-disease or it may mean serious trouble resulting from the affections at the period indicated. I should judge from the shape of his finger-tips, as I cannot see his nails, that he might be subject to heart-disease. I think he will marry but once, and will never be very wealthy, although he will be comfortably well off. He will travel somewhat in the latter part of his life. He probably meets with a disappointment in his first love affair, which comes quite early in life; but he will live to be glad of it and will marry very happily when the proper time comes. This will not be before he is thirty, and he must not try to hurry it.

"SEE MORE."

"A. S. K." has hands of a very different type. They are a woman's hands and indicate a nature of directly opposite tendencies. This hand is as distinctly feminine as the other is masculine. It shows a very refined, gentle nature, fond of music, art, poetry and all things that are delicate and womanly. This person is of a highly nervous temperament, very ambitious and somewhat impatient of restraint. She is anxious to leap at once to successful ends and is too often unwilling to work patiently for them as all must who would succeed permanently. She has great ideas of what she would do and courage to carry them out; if she will cultivate patience and perseverance, and will be more energetic about sticking hard at whatever she undertakes, she is sure to succeed in the end. She will be long-lived and will have fairly good health, although by nature her constitution is delicate. She will probably have a severe illness about the age of thirty-five to forty. She will recover, however, and will live to a green old age. She will marry very happily and make a sensible match at the same time, which is about thirty-five. She will have affairs before that and possibly marry before, but the "grand passion" of her life will come at that time. She has a romantic hand and this attachment (at thirty-five) will be somewhat unexpected and from a man who will come suddenly into her life, probably from another part of the country. She has great good sense and will be guided in matters of the heart by good judgment as well as by love. She will be well off after this marriage and will have a fine reputation. Probably she will be distinguished on her own account, although I think her husband will be famous, too. There is a great deal in a hand like hers, and I would prefer to see and feel such a hand, as there is always more to be told by doing this than it is possible to get out of a reading on paper, where it is impossible to take into account the quality, size and consistency of the hand; but I predict for "A. S. K." a career of considerable variety, on the whole lucky and always interesting.

PEPSIN-SALTED PEANUTS.

Dyspepsia, Insomnia and Other Ills Cured by the Common American Peanut.

IF the day ever dawns when science shall have robbed Nature of her last secret the world's people of that era will marvel at the host of simple things that Nature possessed for the welfare of mankind. Diligent investigation has lately discovered that the common American peanut contains qualities which when scientifically prepared and made operative with salt and pepsin in proper proportions acts with amazing promptitude on the gastric juices, relieving almost immediately dyspeptic disturbances, and, in time, curing dyspepsia in its worst forms.

To America is due the honor of having first produced the peanut (arachis hypogæa). Its true name is "goober," and Virginia is noted for exceptionally large crops of the nut. Since something of its real value has become known other warm countries succeeded in growing it. The plant is leguminous and of many branches, resembling somewhat the clover. It is planted and cared for much like peas or beans and is sometimes called earth or ground nut on account of its vines running along on the ground. Two years ago any one recommending peanuts for dyspepsia would have been geered at, and rightly, too, for it is of more recent date that the medicinal qualities of the nut were discovered. Until this discovery these qualities were dominated by an oil in which the peanut is rich. This oil is non-drying and valuable as a lubricant. It is also used extensively as an adulterant for olive oil.

Frequent experiments discovered that the peanut was also rich in nutriment, and that this food when peptonized acted like magic in dispelling heartburn, curing insomnia, and putting the digestive apparatus in working order. All well-informed medical men know that science has succeeded in isolating so pure a pepsin that it will digest 25,000 times its own weight in albumen. Pepsin is one of the albuminoids or nitrogenous substances, and it has the power of converting proteids into peptones. When the process of digestion does not furnish sufficient pepsin to accomplish complete assimilation of the food dyspepsia begins to entrench itself in the system. Then have a care, for, if its inroads are not blocked and the disease routed, years of intense suffering are sure to follow.

Everybody likes peanuts. Ever since the first "Young America" laughed at the antics of the circus clown peanuts have been popular. Children love to eat them on the sly "when the teacher isn't looking," while older persons have been known to crack them quietly in their pockets and sneak the palatable kernels into their mouths at the theater. Even the confirmed dyspeptic loves them, but is afraid. Who, it may be asked, ever expected to hear of peanuts being used as a remedy for dyspepsia, for Bright's Disease, for Diabetes, for Insomnia and for corpulency?

Germany claims the credit of having discovered the possibilities of the peanut, and an eminent chemist in our employ has demonstrated that "pepsin-salted" peanuts lose none of the peanut flavor in the preparation. Our process of preparing them is such that the oil is neutralized while the flavor and the medicinal properties of the nut are retained. This makes a food-medicine that is certain to be the delight of everybody.

In connection with medicinal qualities of pepsin-salted peanuts it might be interesting as well as instructive to know that peanuts outrank, by a large percentage, such nutritive foods as cheese, peas, beef, rice, potatoes, milk, rye flour, and veal. Already the Germans are making flour and butter from the peanut, and the success of the venture has been such that peanut planters everywhere are preparing to double their usual crops.

We are the first in the United States to prepare pepsin-salted peanuts for the market, and we hope to merit success solely from the quality of the goods which we shall dispose of through our agents at 10c. per package.

Experiments have proved that our pepsin-salted peanuts will cure heartburn and relieve all the other pangs of chronic dyspepsia.

Sufferers from the effects of Bright's Disease and other kidney troubles have noted marked progress after treatment.

Corpulency disappears because the pepsin-salted peanuts digests and makes other food digest.

Half a handful eaten one hour before retiring will induce sleep and a continuation of pepsin-salted peanuts rightly will cure insomnia.

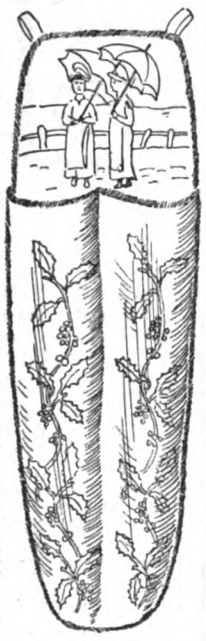
Most interesting and instructive of the recent products of electrical science; teaches and instructs while it amuses, young and old alike. Scientific in construction and no student or ingenious boy should be without it. Perfectly harmless, but produces no end of fun, by giving shocks to circles and many harmless tricks. FOR A HOME CURER. Doctors know almost every known disease and pain yields readily to electrical currents. The cost of electric batteries as generally sold places them far beyond reach of any but the wealthy. This Electrical Machine has been produced by the latest and most improved machinery and at nominal cost as compared with the expensive batteries formerly sold at $8, $10 or $20 each. The great improvements in machinery enables us to produce this and to offer it to you for a mere trifle. See What Electricity is Used For. There is no disease of the nerves or any bodily pain which will not yield readily to electric currents. This wonderful machine utilizes the forces of nature; drives out Rheumatic Pains, Neuralgia and every species of blood and nerve disease; Cures Weakness of every kind and nature and restores youthful health and vigor. Works like a miracle for that worn out feeling and languor and despondency and strengthening nervous system with a direct (not alternating) current, large in volume but pleasant to take, no shock or irritation. Patent switch adjusts current to weakest child or strongest man. A valuable treatise accompanies every machine shipped. We now place nature's great restorative agent, Electricity, within the reach of every sufferer rich or poor.



A Wonderful Offer to All. This Electrical Machine is needed in every home and family. We will send one to any person who will send us $1.00, and 25 cents to pay all shipping charges besides sending our great home paper, COMFORT, subscription paid for one year. ($1.25 for everything.)

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

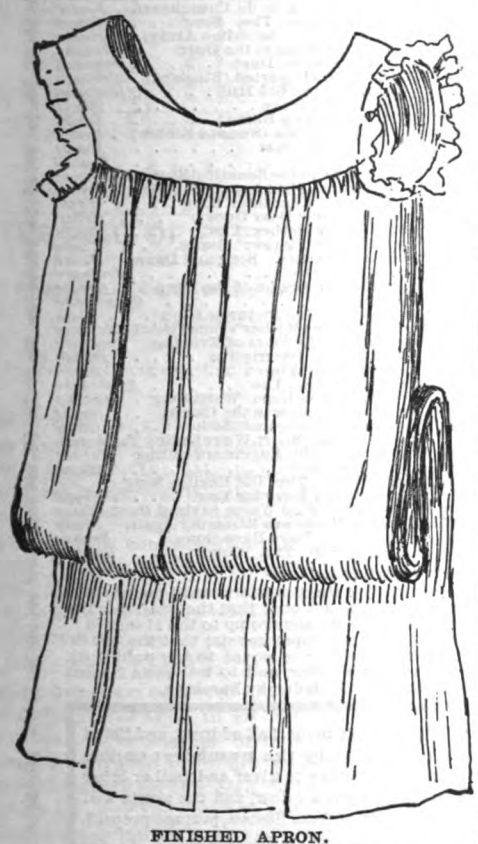
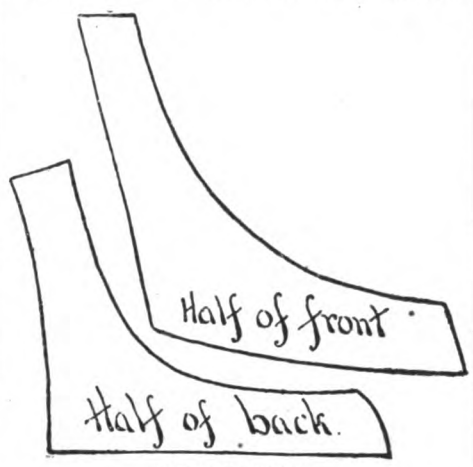


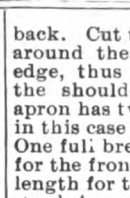
THE attic, being a catch-all for the articles which are out of date and yet which are too good to be thrown away, is a very interesting place in which to spend an hour or two, several times during the year. We there often find things we had entirely forgotten we ever owned, and it often happens that they are the very things we are in need of. Recently, on such a visit I unearthed an umbrella case. These cases were much in vogue a dozen years ago, but, like everything else, got slightly out of date and so was relegated to a trunk in the attic, but it always was a useful ornament and knowing this I pressed out the wrinkles and it now adorns a closet door and is a very convenient receptacle for four umbrellas. Our illustration shows it. It is made of heavy unbleached linen, the back piece being 26 inches long by 9 inches wide at the top, tapering slightly from top to bottom, so that at the bottom it is 4 inches wide; it may be rounded, at top and bottom, or left with square corners, as preferred. Near the top are embroidered figures in outline, or leaves or sprays of flowers may be used. The pocket is 28 inches long by 8 wide, and is embroidered with two sprays of holly. This pocket is basted onto the back, from the bottom to within 8 inches of the top, and the edges are bound with braid, two loops being left at the top of the back piece, with which to hang the article on a door or wall. The center of the pocket is stitched the entire length, to the back piece, thus forming two pockets. Before the pocket piece is stitched to the back piece the top should be bound with braid like that used for the edge. As the pocket piece is wider than the back piece, some plaits must be laid over in the former, at the bottom, to make it fit onto the latter. The one here illustrated is worked with red tambo, and the braid used for the edge is ordinary red wool binding braid. A pocket of this kind keeps the dust from umbrellas, and keeps them out of the way.



Cases should always be taken off umbrellas when putting them away, as, if left loose, the silk will not crack so readily. Tie the cases onto the handles, and then they will always be at hand when needed. A pocket of the kind described above will easily hold 4 umbrellas, even though they are only loosely rolled.

At Christmas I had such a treasure of an apron given to me, that I want to describe it to the readers of this column, and if they haven't one similar to it, they had better go right to work and make one, for it is not only useful, but a very becoming garment as well, and that usually counts.

FINISHED APRON.



Our illustrations show the apron, also the pattern of the yoke, which is easily followed and enlarged by any one desiring to make one. The front of the yoke may be cut on one piece by laying the pattern on a fold of the cloth—or may be cut in two pieces and seamed in the middle of the front; the back of yoke is cut in two pieces, as the apron buttons down the back. Cut two yokes and seam them together around the top, and then turn and stitch the edge, thus making the yokes double; stitch the shoulder seams. The lower part of the apron has two breadths of the material, which in this case is blue and white striped percale. One full breadth, a yard and a half long is used for the front, and two half-breadths the same length for the back. Gather the breadths and sew between the lining and outside of the yoke, leaving a few inches on the edges coming under the arms, to run out beyond the arm holes, plain. Then stitch the under arm seams to the bottom, hem bottom and edges at middle of back, and put a button and buttonhole at back of yoke. A narrow ruffle is then inserted between lining and outside of arm hole, and then this and the bottom of the yoke are stitched. This is a pretty pattern for a child's apron, made of nainsook or barred muslin, and sash ends may be inserted in seam under arms and tied in the back. If desired to button from yoke to bottom, two breadths must be used in the back, instead of one divided in the middle, otherwise it will not be full enough to button to the bottom and look well.

Habits and Superstitions of Musicians.

ONE of my musician friends, said Flageolet Dash to the Leader, has a piano; he not only plays on it, but he makes the inside serve him as a safe. He plays a tune, then lifts the lid and takes out a cheese sandwich and a bottle of beer. Of course he is a bachelor. I know another musician who plays on one of those big brass things that go around the body (a helicon). Well, when he goes off to play at a street parade he carries his luncheon inside the instrument; and he tells me that the tones and the power of the instrument are improved by its sides coming in contact with the sausages, sauer kraut and black bread. Yet he seems to make just as good music when the luncheon is packed in the vicinity of his wind-bag. I know a flute-player who thinks it unlucky to wash his hands on the day he plays the flute. He says he was once persuaded to defy the superstition and washed his hands, and on that very day some one stole his flute case. I know a fiddle-player who says it's the very highest kind of luck to be invited out to dinner; and he says that if he is ever foolish enough to decline the offer, he always plays out of tune. Another musician has a superstition that it is a sign of luck if he takes somebody else's hat and umbrella in place of his own. He told me, as a curious fact, that the luck always came to him when he was wearing an old hat or carrying an old umbrella.

A recent short story by an American writer advocated the purchase of Mt. Etna and Vesuvius by American Stock Company. The volcanic power was to be utilized for motive force. The serious and detailed explanation was accepted by a European newspaper as a statement of fact and its editorial column launched forth in bitter denunciation of the sordid spirit of gain that actuated all Americans. Not even the scenic beauty of the greatest of volcanoes was free from the dollar and cent standard of the American. Well, they do not know when we are in earnest and our fun isn't yet within the comprehension of the literal minded foreigner. They needn't feel at all disturbed. We don't want any of their old effete volcanoes for show or blow or ducats. We've got the biggest firepot on earth right in our own Hawaii. Kilauea has been firing up recently and the worn out monarchies simply haven't got a volcano that can enter the same class as Kilauea when it gets down to business.

The French Government has made a wise decision in refusing to exhibit the work of woman by itself. The stage has been passed that required woman to prove that she was capable of doing work in any art, profession or science. The sex barrier practically does not limit woman's field of work. She has proven her right of admission into the field of competition and now she must prove that she can hold the ground she has won, not because she is a woman but because she is a competent worker. It is oftener easier to win than to retain the prizes of this world. In the fair field of open competition it is the fittest who survive. The best lawyer, the best architect, the best physician, the best artist rises to the top through merit of effort. It raises woman's work to a higher plane when the question is not one of the sex of the producer, but simply of the relative excellence of the production.

Every nation is at heart savage. Longfellow's vision of the time when "the warrior's name would be a name abhorred" seems farther off to-day than ever. The peace proposition of the young ruler of the least civilized nation of Europe scarcely meets with even serious comment. Victories of statesmanship and diplomacy do not appeal to the masses of the people. The old savage admiration of the battle hero yet sweeps all before it. Nothing stronger illustrates this than the relative success of the effort to raise a fund for a memorial to Gladstone and the monument towards a memorial for Kitchener, the victor of the Soudan. Popular interest in the Gladstone memorial seems to have died out. It was proposed to place a library in many English towns with the funds arising from a popular subscription. This Gladstone Memorial Library would, it was felt, be a fit tribute to the Grand Old Man. The project is likely to be carried through by the interest of a few wealthy men. On the other hand the public are tumbling over one another to contribute toward a college for blacks at Khartoum to be called the Gordon Memorial College. It is the old savage instinct of admiration of the victor in battle.

The Oread Institute of Worcester, Mass., is entering upon a work of practical philanthropy. This school is the successor of the New Era Cooking School. It offers free tuition, room and board to one woman from each state and territory. The governor of the state is to be given the appointment of the candidate subject to the conditions that the appointee must be between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five, must have a High school education or its equivalent and must show natural ability and a desire to learn. After her graduation she will be aided to a position in her state. People are just beginning to comprehend the intimate relation between food and the mental and moral development of man. What we eat and what we are are not two entirely separate problems. The scientific study of nutrition of food stuffs and of methods of preparing food is constantly receiving more and more attention. These scholarships mean more for the good of the community than a corresponding number of college scholarships. We do not neglect or decry the mental, but it depends more closely upon the physical than people have believed. The Oread scholarships are steps in the right direction.

March fourth marks the middle of President McKinley's administration and the close of the fifty-fifth Congress of the United States. In reviewing the events of the last one hundred and ten years, or the time in which the will of the people has been shown through its Congress, the great importance of this Congress stands clearly out. It has had to decide not only what is wise at the moment but what is likely to be wisdom in the sight of future generations. Never before in our history has a choice of acts seemed to rest more completely in the hands of the people. In the great national crises that have arisen during the one hundred and ten years of our nationality, there has been less freedom of determination. We have not precipitated affairs but have waited, and when the inevitable was thrust upon us have accepted it with strength and fortitude. When we entered upon the war with Spain it is safe to say that a large—a very large—proportion of thoughtful people were doubtful of the wisdom of the act. After the war begun the nation was one mind and one heart until its close. There seems little doubt that the policy of expansion is a favorite one with the people at large. The fifty-fifth Congress will be a marked one in the history of our nation. The United States has with one bound entered into the arena with the great colonial powers of the earth. New times demand new theories and new practices and the next Congress must face conditions and questions for whose solving the past furnishes no precedent.

The Supreme Court Justices are hereafter to wear an insignia of office in the form of a black silk robe. This has always been the custom in the Supreme Court at Washington and its general introduction is to be commended. We are told by one well-known writer that law has its seat in the bosom of God. Certainly all that adds to the dignity and prestige of the law will react favorably upon the community. Some radical believers in plain, unadorned, democratic simplicity detect a startling departure from national traditions in this innovation. As a matter of fact the precedent set by Washington favored more pomp and circumstance in the administration of all departments of government. The State Court of Appeals in New York some time ago adopted the gown. Many lawyers believe that its general adoption by all magistrates and judges would add much to the dignity of court proceedings. Lord Bacon once declared that the Judge when he sat upon the bench was another man from the layman. No doubt a change of apparel emphasizes the different attitude of mind required from a man as a judge or a man as an ordinary citizen. The association of long ages of historic precedent is shown by the wearing of a gown. The old Egyptian lawgivers were so arrayed. Rome's greatest contribution to civilization was in the old Roman laws and her law judges wore the gown of their exalted office. In early ages the gown was white; the black robe became more common in the days when the priests were judges. Human nature does not change with successive ages. The dress that was the symbol of justice and right is more needed to-day than at any time. We need to revive any precedent or tradition that adds dignity without sacrificing self respect.

The question of the admission of Mr. Roberts the Congressman elect from Utah to a seat in the House has greatly excited the moral feelings of the nation. Mr. Roberts is a polygamist and hundreds of petitions have been prepared to present to the House asking that he may be refused a seat. Utah is one of the states having the smallest representation allowed by the Constitution. Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, Wyoming and Utah by the census of 1890 are entitled to but one representative. This man has great responsibility, as the sole representative of the people as individuals. The question of the admission of members of Congress is not a moral one but a constitutional one. The constitution demands three qualifications; age, citizenship, residence. A representative must be twenty-five years of age, a citizen of the United States and a resident of the state from which he is chosen. The Constitution expressly states that "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members." This is understood to allow them to judge under three provisions of the Constitution in reference to eligibility. Cases of contested elections are frequent in the House. Two men elected to the Senate have been declared disqualified by that body; Albert Gallatin of Pennsylvania in 1798 and James Shields of Illinois in 1849, were barred on the ground of insufficient citizenship. If Mr. Roberts fails in any one of the three Constitutional requirements for a representation he may legally be refused admission to the House. If not he must be admitted, but there is a Constitutional clause that will enable the House to enforce the moral sentiment of the public that it represents. The House may on vote of two-thirds of its members censure or expel a member. This power has been exercised. It would be a travesty upon the law against polygamy should the House accept and retain a member who was indeniably guilty of the crime. The polygamy question in Utah was for years a shame to our laws and our sense of morality. The man who upholds such an institution should not be allowed a place in the deliberations of the nation. If by the provisions of the Constitution he is legally entitled to a seat, he should have it. Then the House should put itself on record by expelling the man who is trying to defy public opinion.

THE AGE OF ELECTRICITY.

The Horse and Many Other Old Ideas Passing Away.

The Present Generation one of Progress.

Electricity, the giant force of the world, has come wonderfully to the front within a quarter of a century; the telephone, Electric motive-power, Electrical lighting and heating and many other inventions which but then were infants are now the established means of civilization. No part of the electric field has witnessed greater and more successful advance than the substitution of electricity for horses on the street railways.

About a dozen years ago the experiment of running horsecars on street railways by the use of electricity was tried in an Ohio city as an experiment. The success of this line as demonstrating greater economy and speed and more satisfactory service lead to its immediate adoption all over the world and to-day the trolley has supplanted the horsecar almost universally, while hundreds of cities and smaller towns have trolleys where the expense of a horse motive-power line could not have been considered.

The electric railroad is but the beginning of the extended use of this marvellous force which is generally predicted as the heat, light and power of the coming century. It will supersede the use of steam as a power at a comparatively early day, or the best prophets are at fault. Considering the tremendous strides taken in the last ten years no one can predict what may not be accomplished as electricity becomes better understood.

This puts COMFORT in mind of a letter written by a leading electric railway man in the West in praise of another step of progress, which is so interesting that we reproduce it herewith. This bright-minded man has been quick to observe that in other fields than that of electricity there is rapid progress being made and his letter shows what he thinks of it. Thus the popular method of providing the best sheet music for every home at trifling cost marks in its own way as great progress as the harnessing down of the electric force to man's use.

Comfort Music Room,
Augusta, Maine,

Gentlemen:-

I wish to express my sincere thanks for the music sent me today and must confess that I was very much surprised as to the good quality of the paper and type. Yours is the greatest offer of the day and ought to be brought before every one who understands anything about music.

Yours very truly,

Fred. D. Hoffmann

But it is not only the man of action but also the philosopher and student that recognizes the great merit of this singular plan that has placed every home in a way to obtain the best music at trifling cost. Rev. R. B. Collins, the popular and learned minister of Meyersdale, Pa., writes of this method: "New music ordered came to hand this morning in excellent condition * * * Allow me to thank you and express my opinion * * * To say we are pleased is to put it too mildly, we are delighted, and are amazed at the cheapness of your publications * * an inspiration and a help * * I wish you abundant success in your efforts. You are placing much good music in homes which otherwise would be deprived of it. We shall continue to order."

Read the music offer on another page we want every one to take advantage, and will gladly refund if not exactly as described or even better. Ask any musical friend or critic to make a trial test.

The authentic records of the Chinese race began about 4,000 years ago, though the traditional history extends much further back.

GEMS MADE TO ORDER.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

It IS said that no such display of diamonds has ever been seen in New York as is on exhibition this winter. The fashionable women at the opera are fairly laden with glittering gems, some of the leaders among them being adorned not only with necklaces, bracelets and rings, but even with stomachers and coronets of precious stones. Yet it is very interesting to consider that a slight improvement on an invention already made would cause these ladies of the gilded world to divest themselves of such gauds and to abandon the wearing of diamonds forever.

Real diamonds have already been manufactured in the laboratory, and it only remains to increase their size somewhat in order to render gems of this kind comparatively cheap—provided, of course, that the cost of artificial production is not excessive. Prof. Frank Clarke, of the United States Geological Survey, and other eminent chemists, are of the opinion that before long the carbon crystals now so precious will be turned out on a commercial scale, both as to size and quantity, without going to the mines for them. Should that happen, rich people will no longer care to wear diamonds, any more than they would now adorn themselves with bits of cutglass, however beautiful to the eye.

Indeed, they may be obliged to give up precious stones altogether, inasmuch as pretty nearly every kind of gem threatens to become a cheap laboratory product, thanks to recent scientific discoveries. For example, emeralds have been made by fusing together boric acid, oxide of chromium, and flawed and worthless crystals of real emerald. These, like the artificial diamonds, have not been obtained of sufficient size as yet to be worth anything in the market; but they point the way. Sapphires and rubies have likewise been reproduced—the latter of marketable size, by fusing small ruby "sparks" together.

This is not a question of imitation, properly so termed. The rubies are as real as those made by Nature, and indistinguishable from the latter save by the aid of a microscope. However, the sale of them has been forbidden in France where they are made, and people are not disposed to buy them, simply for the reason that they are counterfeit. At the present time a real ruby of 4 carats' weight, of good color, is worth $9000, while a diamond of the same size is valued at only $1000. Real amethysts have been made accidentally in the pottery furnaces at Sevres. Garnets have been reproduced, though imperfectly. There is no trouble in manufacturing the material of the opal, but the optical properties of that stone, to which are due its beautiful colors, have been turned out by Traube, a German chemist.

It is obvious from this statement the gem market is seriously threatened, though as yet it has not suffered. Jewelers have been able to keep artificial rubies out of the market up to now, but there is no question that these stones will find their way into use eventually. Rubies are scarce and infrequently worn; with diamonds it is quite otherwise, and laboratory reproductions of them, if cheap, would soon drive the mined crystals out of employment. Diamonds of any kind would in that event become so common as to be despised by the average bartender for purposes of adornment. The danger of the prospect suggested may be understood when it is explained that the world's stock of diamonds at the present time represent a value of $1,000,000,000. Of this amount, dealers hold about $350,000,000 worth, and private individuals are owners of the balance.

It is proposed to utilize the power of Niagara Falls to make diamonds, the reason back of this suggestion being that immense forces and an enormous heat seem to be required for the production of these crystals in large size. Science is now of the opinion that Nature makes diamonds in the bowels of the earth by subjecting a mixture of iron and carbon to a tremendous temperature, the stuff being allowed to cool very slowly, after which it is vomited up as volcanic matter. That is almost unquestionably the way in which the diamonds of the great South African fields have been formed, the carbon being crystallized out during the cooling. This process has been imitated successfully in Paris by M. Moissan, who fuses charcoal and wrought iron at 4,500 degrees Fahrenheit in an electric furnace. After slow cooling, the carbon of the charcoal is crystallized out in the form of microscopic diamonds.

It is observed that these artificial diamonds sometimes explode. Curiously enough, the natural stones frequently do the same thing soon after they are brought out of the mine. They have been known to burst in the pockets of miners, or when held in the warm hand. Big ones seem to be more liable to burst than small ones, and in this way valuable stones have been destroyed. As a safeguard against such accidents, dealers frequently pack large diamonds in raw potatoes for shipment. The phenomenon described appears to be due to a small quantity of gas which is confined at enormous pressure in the interior of the gem. When warm, it has a tendency to expand, and so explodes the stone. This statement is made on the authority of the famous Prof. Crookes.

In this connection, it is very interesting to notice the fact that most of the diamonds obtained from the South African or other mines are not complete crystals but fragments, as if exploded. Nature, apparently, has produced them in her own chemical laboratories at great depths, where the temperature is comparable to that of the electric furnace, and where the immense pressure that seems to be required is existent. It is in recognition of these requirements that the suggestion respecting the employment of Niagara has been offered, the power obtainable from the cataract being sufficient to furnish any amount of pressure, and to give, through the medium of electricity, an enormous heat.

Were it not for the propensity of the natural diamond to explode, doubtless large gems of this kind would be comparatively common. Just to show what Nature is able to do in the production of this species of crystal, an object lesson is offered by the diamond—the biggest ever known—called the Jagersfontein Excelsior, which weighs nine hundred and seventy-one carats, or nearly half a pound. It is of pure water, except for a slight flaw near the center. The owner of it is the Pope, to whom it was presented, and its value has been estimated at five million dollars. The sort of flaw described is apt to be observable in any diamond and frequently it takes the form of a small cavity, which is believed to contain the highly-compressed gas already referred to. If this gem had chanced to burst it would probably have been resolved into a multitude of comparatively worthless splinters.

The mines of South Africa produce an average of fifty-five hundred carats of diamonds per day. The gems are dug out of great holes in the earth and the richness of the deposits does not appear to diminish with the depth. The formation is a sort of blue earth, as hard almost as stone, which is taken out of the mines and spread over the ground for hundreds of acres. Exposed to the atmosphere it disintegrates rapidly, and this makes it easy to wash out the diamonds. The washing is done on long tables, at which men stand and pick out the glittering crystals. The latter are cleaned by boiling them in acids, after which they are carefully sorted for size, color and purity. The room in which they are displayed at the offices of the company, affords a striking spectacle, being lighted by large windows, beneath which runs a broad counter covered with white sheets of paper. On the paper are laid out ever so many glistening heaps of diamonds, some pink, some white, some blue and some yellow.

A few years ago, before Cecil Rhodes became the arbiter of the diamond mining industry in South Africa, he went to Mr. Barney Barnato, who recently met with so tragic a death by suicide, and appealed to that gentleman's sense of the picturesque by asking him to grant a view, if he could, of a bucket full of diamonds. Barney was a man who loved display above all things and he acquiesced. He took the whole of the stock that was then on hand and emptied it into an ordinary pail, which it just about filled. The exhibition was certainly a sight for the gods, but the shrewd Mr. Rhodes had a purpose in view quite beyond any mere gratification of the eye. He expressed his thanks and went away. Then he put his own big stock of diamonds on the market, knowing that Barney could not possibly be an immediate competitor, inasmuch as it would take at least three weeks to sort out the gems assembled in the bucket. The result was a great profit to Mr. Rhodes.

Some years ago a deposit of beautiful white diamonds of excellent water, was discovered at Inverel, in New South Wales. It was imagined that immense wealth was at hand, but the fact was subsequently disclosed that the stones were so remarkably hard as to be practically unworkable, the result being that the gems had to be sold for use in rock-drills. The natural diamond, of course, is comparatively unbeautiful, depending upon cutting for the display of its marvelous beauties. This, by the way, did not prevent the potentates of the East Indies in ancient times, from appreciating diamonds as highly as we do to-day. The Koh-i-Noor, now the most prized gem in the British crown, was never cut during the period of centuries in which it became the property of a series of Oriental sovereigns. It was cut twice after coming into British hands, and one part of it was found so much harder than the rest that it was almost impossible to work it.

During the last twenty-five years, ten tons of diamonds, worth three hundred million dollars uncut and six hundred million dollars after cutting, have been added to the world's wealth—an amount more than twice as great as were known to exist before.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Again March is with us. Coming in, as it always does in the northern States, "like a roaring lion," we bear with its mad frolics and fierce storms with what patience we may, hoping that when its reign is over it will "go out like a lamb" to make way for gentle April.

Our first letter this month takes us not only far from our bleak northern March winds but also "far from the madding crowd," and introduces us to scenes and people with which few of us are familiar.

"One of the most interesting and beautiful parts of California is off the line of railway travel, and so difficult of access that comparatively few people are familiar with it. Here the conditions of life are quiet and primitive, having changed but little from the customs prevalent all over the State when it was admitted to the Union, in 1848.

"Pala is twenty-five miles from Oceanside, where one leaves the train that connects Los Angeles and San Diego. It is reached only by private conveyance or the mail wagon, and the road follows the windings of the San Luis Rey river, or climbs long, steep hills; for the country is a broken one that becomes fairly mountainous ere Pala is reached.

PALA MISSION.

"In the center of a lovely little valley stands the ruined Mission of Pala, a branch of the noble San Luis Rey Mission. The scene is very picturesque—the green valley, encircled by the willow-bordered river, and hemmed in by purple mountains, the scattered adobe ranch houses under their shade of spreading umbrella trees, and the crumbling old Mission, with its curious white bell tower, detached from the Mission building.

"The Pauma Indians worship at this Mission, and were holding their annual fiesta at the time of my visit. These Indians are a revelation in their cleanliness, intelligence and thrift. They are fine-looking and dress well, living in comfortable homes, where the men till the soil and the women make baskets and intricate patterns of 'drawn-work' for sale. Their children are sent to the country schools, and, when they are older, to the Government training schools, or convents.

"The funeral ceremonies of an Indian baby that took place in the Mission one morning were remarkable for being conducted by girls, in the absence of a priest. They sang hymns in Latin, Spanish and English; and intoned the Catholic ritual for the dead, closing with a prayer for the soul of the departed infant, followed by the Lord's

SEBASTIAN AND HIS GRANDSON.

Prayer. The mother knelt on the earthen floor during the services, with a black shawl thrown over her head, and was surrounded by kneeling friends. The little pine box, covered with white cloth and decked with rosettes of gilt paper, was borne to the burial ground by young girls and boys. After it had been lowered into the grave, men, women and children, in turn, took up a handful of earth, kissed it, and dropped it on the coffin. Then the mother's grief burst the bonds of native stoicism and she wailed unrestrainedly, while the crowd which had gathered turned to the merry-making of the fiesta.

"Large booths, called rematha*s*, had been constructed of tules and willow boughs over a framework, and in these dancing and feasting were kept up for four days and four nights. One dance, known only to a few old Indians, was performed every day by Sebastian and his grandson, to whom he had taught it. Sebastian is a hero, for few white men are capable of such an act of self-sacrifice as he once committed. His only son, the pride of his heart, stole a cow, and sold it. Sebastian was grief-stricken, and determined to save his son from a prison, which might ruin the young man's whole life; so he swore that he had stolen the cow, and was sent to San Quentin for two years. As if this were not enough, Sebastian's beloved wife died the day before he regained his liberty. The son married, and after some years died of consumption, confessing his guilt before he passed away.

"It is worth while to witness an Indian fiesta among these mountains at night. The rustic rematha*s*, surrounded by hundreds of brown-skinned men, women and children, the merry strum of the guitars and violins, the camp-fires, the soft Spanish accent on every hand, the ruined Mission walls and gleaming belfry, with the moonlight over all, form a scene that does not appear to belong to the New World."

CLARA S. BROWN, Los Angeles, Cal.

Now here is a letter which you ought to have had last summer; it was written then, but reached me too late to use. However, I think you will enjoy it equally as well now. Our cousin writes most charmingly of her day at Yale. She says:

"Class Day at Yale is certainly one of the most pleasant and picturesque events of the whole week. And this particular Class Day was no exception to the rule. From a Yale man's point of view it is the last time the class will meet together to crack jokes and indulge in good-natured 'horsing,' so with true Yale dash he enters into the spirit of the thing and makes it a day long to be remembered by the visitor.

"It was a beautiful June afternoon and the seats of the huge amphitheatre erected on the campus, were filled with men and women in gala attire; each one adding his or her share to the brilliancy of the scene. Near the entrance a band was stationed playing college songs and national airs. All around and above us, forming a perfect background, were the famous old elms of New Haven.

"In the center on long benches sat the seniors in caps and gowns smoking the long white clay pipes sacred to Class Day. Here and there, looking strangely out of place with the black-gowned students were men in uniforms of the Army and Navy. These were the members of the class who so quietly laid aside their books and studies and loyally responded to their country's call. For the time they were allowed to cast aside the discipline of camp and training-ship in order to graduate with their class.

"And what a happy, noisy, rollicking class it was! They roared with laughter when a class historian was unusually pungent in his 'hits.' When the name of a popular classmate was mentioned they shouted: 'Put him up! Put him up!' and were not content till he had been swung to his nearest classmates' shoulders and held up to the gaze of an admiring and amused audience. When the 'boys in blue, were put up the cheers were deafening, for visitors and fellow students joined in that tribute to the soldier boys of Yale. Meantime the class pipe, an immense affair, beautifully carved and decorated, had been going the rounds. Each student took a whiff and a puff and passed it on to his neighbor to do likewise.

"The exercises closed with the singing of the favorite college song 'Bright College Years,' and as I listened to that grand old hymn sung as only Yale men can sing it I wondered what the future held in store for the class of Yale '98.

"Oh, let us strive that ever we May let these words our watch-cry be,
Where'er upon life's sea we sail:
'For God, for Country, and for Yale.'"

HELEN CLIFFORD, Gloversville, N. Y.

Here is an account of a wolf hunt written by a cousin in far-off North Dakota. He says:

"Let me tell you of a wolf hunt which took place here a few days ago. The North Dakota wolf, or coyote, as he is called by the ranchers, is a long, slim, sorry-looking animal, with coarse hair, a bushy tail, and a long, sharp face. He is not so ravenous as the black wolf of the forest, but is very troublesome to the ranchers' sheep.

"The ranchers living near the Plateau du Coteau had many sheep killed by the wolves, so they decided to hunt and kill some of them. They met at a place known as Long Lake Ranch, where they made preparations for the hunt. Some of the men rode in a spring wagon and others on ponies. They all armed themselves with clubs, but took no guns. They started early in the morning, accompanied by half a dozen hounds who were eager for the sport. After riding about three miles the hounds scented a wolf's track, and they followed it until they came upon a half-starved wolf picking the bones of a dead sheep which some other wolves had devoured the previous night. The wolf, seeing the crowd of hunters and the hounds approaching him, started to run, but the hounds gave chase, and soon seized and held him until the hunters arrived at the place and despatched him with their clubs."

M. H. WENDLAND, Carrington, N. D.

A very well-written letter on volcanoes comes from cousin Charles W. Pullen of Kentucky, but I cannot use it because he has only written what we can read in books on such subjects. Now if he would only climb a volcano for our benefit, and tell us what he sees up there I would be exceedingly glad to get his letter.

Now we have some extracts from a letter describing a trip from Mexico to the States, by the way of Monterey and Eagle Pass. I wish I could give you the whole letter, for it is very interesting, but my space, alas, is too limited to admit of doing so.

"We left Tampico about midnight—the next morning we found ourselves still climbing the mountains. When we reached the tableland it was a desolate scene. The bare, rocky mountains in the distance, bounding a level stretch of country, with no living thing except the cacti, and no habitation except the native villages. Such a clamor as arose each time the train stopped, from boys with fruits, hot tomales, and other things to sell! Some of these fruits are very delicious and refreshing. They must grow wild, as I saw no ground under cultivation; all the soil seems rich, but the lack of water in most parts of Mexico is the great trouble.

"The Mexicans at these stations seemed abjectly poor, and their houses were no better than pens, being built with the ground for the floor, poles stuck into the ground forming the sides, and a thatched roof; simply an opening for the door, and no windows. I sincerely pitied the loneliness of the Americans who have charge of these stations, which in this section are few and many miles apart.

"When within a hundred miles of Monterey the scene changed, and became as lovely and attractive as it was grand and desolate before. We passed beautiful haciendas surrounded by lands in a high state of cultivation, intersected in all directions by canals for irrigation. For many miles this side of Monterey the same state of cultivation delighted the eye, but the next morning, all was desolation again—and very hot and dusty, a most disagreeable portion of the trip. We crossed the line at Eagle Pass during the night, and had not the slightest trouble about our baggage.

"For miles and miles on this side the line it is very desolate, and closely resembles parts of Mexico, but after that is passed, the Southern Pacific, the railway over which I traveled from San Antonio, traverses a lovely country, and it looks like home. When we reached New Orleans, I could not but contrast this city, so full of life and energy, with the dreamy old cities of Mexico, which seem to me almost of another world; but there is a charm, which amounts to fascination, in this spell from dreamland, which Mexico throws over nearly all who visit her."

MRS. C. C. MALONE, Hudsonville, Miss.

Now we have a letter from our valued correspondent, Mrs. Early, describing Bruton Parish Church in Williamsburg, Va. She says:

"Williamsburg was the old Colonial capital of Virginia, and Bruton Parish Church was built there more than two hundred years ago. It is in the form of a cross, and the eastern end is overrun with English ivy. As we enter four tablets in the wall arrest our attention. One of them bears the following quaint inscription, 'Near this marble lyes ye Hon'ble Daniel Parke, of ye county of Essex, Esq., who was one of his Ma'tie's Counsellors' and sometime Secretary of the Collony of Virg'a.

BRUTON PARISH CHURCH.

He dyed ye 6th of March, anno 1679. His other felicityes were crowned by his happy marriage with Rebekah, the daughter of George Evelyn of the County of Surry, Esq'e. She died the 2d of Jan., 1672, at Long Ditton, in ye County of Surry and left behind her a most hopeful progeny.'

"The next tablet is 'Inscribed to the memory of Dr. William Cocke, an English Physician born of reputable parents, at Sudsbury in Suffolk, 1672, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. He was learned and polite, of undisputed skill in his profession, of unbounded generosity in his practice, which multitudes yet alive can testify. He was many years of the Council and Secretary of State for this Colony in the reign of Queen Anne and King George. He died suddenly, sitting a judge upon the bench of the General Court in the Capital.' M. D. C. C. XX.

"Going out of the church, we find ourselves in a large, shady churchyard, containing many tombstones, some of them over two centuries old, and with inscriptions so worn by rains that 'Old Mortality's' help is needed to decipher them. The old silver communion service of the Jamestown Episcopal church now belongs to Bruton Parish church, and is very massive. The cup bears the inscription 'Mixe not holy things with profane.'"

MARY W. EARLY, Williamsburg, Va.

I have received a very pleasant letter from a Virginia niece on "a visit to Mars." It is well written, and shows a good deal of imagination and ability, but I cannot give it a prize because our page is not intended for stories; so I can only thank our cousin for her offer and ask her to try again.

Our last prize letter this month is upon Warwick Castle.

"Warwick Castle is in what a well-known writer has termed the Shakespeare country. It is only a few miles distant from Stratford, and is situated upon the same stream, the Avon—that flows through the poet's old home. Nowhere in England did I see more magnificent grounds than those surrounding this famous old Castle. The great stately trees, the beautiful flowers and shrubs, and the vivid green of the wide-spreading lawns, make a picture one cannot forget.

"While our party were wandering about here we sat down to rest beneath some very tall cedars. As we were looking up, admiring their beauty and size, an attendant of the castle passing by, informed us that the trees were the cedars of Lebanon, and the seeds from which they were first grown were brought by the Earls of Warwick from the Holy Land upon their return from the Crusades.

"Warwick Castle is in a state of perfect preservation, and all is grand and palatial. We entered first the Great Hall, a magnificent room rich in historical treasures in the way of books and antiquities. We were especially interested in a saddle used by Queen Elizabeth while on her journey from Warwick to be present at the great festivities at Kenilworth. Then there was an enormous suit of armor, a walking stick and a porridge-pot said to have belonged to Guy, Earl of Warwick, who lived in the tenth century, and who was a giant nine feet high.

WARWICK CASTLE.

"As we passed out of the Great Hall we saw at the end of the long corridor the life-size portrait of Charles the First, painted by the great Dutch artist Van Dyke. So real was the picture it seemed almost as if the figure were actually riding towards us. Passing on we visited the Red Drawing Room and the Green Drawing Room, both of which contain magnificent paintings by Raphael, Rubens, Van Dyke, and other famous artists. In the Cedar Drawing Room is an exquisite bust of a goddess, the work of Hiram Powers, the American sculptor whose Greek Slave, we remember, made his name a famous one. One hall in the castle is called the Amour Passage. Here is a very large collection of ancient armour, cross-bows, battle axes, pikes, arquebuses, daggers, etc.

"But few rooms of the castle are open to visitors, as the greater part of it is made up of the private apartments of the Earl and his family. With all the magnificence and beauty of Warwick Castle we learned that Lady Warwick was discontented there. She much preferred the excitement of London life.

"'Well I declare,' remarked an old lady in our party, 'I must say it takes a great deal to satisfy some folks.' And we all agreed with her.'"

ELIZABETH WOODS, Batavia, N. Y.

Now let us listen to a North Dakota cousin while she tells us of the woodmen's picnic and parade which she lately attended.

"The night before we camped on the shore of the lake near where the woodmen's picnic was to be, and in the morning we passed through the picturesque town of Bigstone, which seems a collection of villages whose odd houses are perched upon hills overlooking the lake or nestle in the valleys, and where the very sidewalks resemble bridges.

Leaving Bigstone the road wound through beautiful scenery, where now and then we caught a glimpse of some lovely home half hidden among the trees and vines. We passed over a river, the outlet of Bigstone Lake, and soon after entered Ortonville, two miles from Bigstone. We followed the gayly-dressed crowd to the park, arriving there just in time to hear the finale of a modern woodman's speech and some fine music by the cornet band.

"After lunch came the woodmen's parade. The boy band of Ortonville was followed by men in white uniforms trimmed with red, and tall caps adorned with big red tassels on top; a banner, the cornet band, a pair of goats, and then men wearing immense boots and carrying an ax so large that it took two men to hold it upright, went by; and then we returned to our camp from which we watched the fireworks in the evening.

S. R. PALMER, Marvin, S. D.

I must not forget to thank my niece, Marion Wilkerson, of Garvin, Texas, for her pleasant letter on the home of Edgar Allan Poe, of which I can only find room for the following extract.

"In the Northern District of New York City is a small old Dutch Cottage of three rooms, with a porch extending along its entire front, which was the home of Edgar Allan Poe and his lovely wife during the last four years of the poet's life. We followed up the little winding stair to the attic room which Poe used for his study, and where he wrote his most noted works.

"The house, I think, has recently been purchased and opened to the public by the Shakespeare Society of New York."

Here is an extract from another beautifully written letter on Venice, but which does not win a prize as it is only the result of reading and not of a personal visit. It says:

"Venice is the most novel city in the world, being the only one that has its streets of water instead of land. Venice has a population of one hundred and fifty thousand, and has one hundred and fifty canals. The largest of these is in the shape of the letter S, and runs through the most beautiful part of the city. These canals intersect one another at many angles, and four thousand gondolas are constantly busy conveying passengers to and fro about the city, which is built upon one hundred and seventeen islands, large and small, which are now protected on every side by solid stone masonry.

MATILDA M. WEST, Long, Ga.

Now my space is filled so I must keep the rest of my letters for another month; and with heartiest good wishes for the happiness and welfare of each and all of the cousins I will say good-bye.

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

IT is pretty early yet to talk about vacations—but still a little planning does no harm. Why not take it a-wheel this year? And if you have a wife or sister or daughter, plan to take her along too.

Few women have yet learned the possibilities of the wheel in this direction, and, as a rule, confine themselves to the minor pleasure of short daily runs in the immediate neighborhood of home.

The contrast between a short run and a week's tour is as great as that felt by a yachtsman taking an occasional sail down the bay or a delightful month's cruise along the coast. Starting away into the open of vague uncertainty carries with it a delightful feeling of elation and freedom; one leaves behind the tameness of security, and eagerly challenges the unknown of time and events.

In wheeling, as in many other sports, the first requisite is sound health. No woman should undertake a tour who is not fortified with a strong constitution. She should be in such good condition as to meet with indifference the discomforts incident to a traveler dependent upon chance accommodations; she should have a surplus of energy to resist fatigue, a fortitude equal to occasional hard work or ill luck, and the power to brave inclemencies of wind and weather.

As early in the spring as the weather permits, daily rides on the wheel should be taken, at first very moderate as to distance and duration, and as varied as possible as regards the nature of country ridden over. One soon learns what she is equal to, whether fifteen miles or fifty a day is her limit, and it is always safer to keep well within the limit; whether she can climb a hill or must walk it—and here pride must sometimes be set aside, for all women have not the same limit of endurance.

If you are going abroad, it is well to join one of the foreign Tourist Clubs. Membership in the French club (obtainable through Col. Francis M. Hesseltine of Boston), is very helpful. The Italian road-book is also excellent. For travel in Germany and Switzerland it is desirable, in addition to the above-mentioned road-books (French and Italian), to make frequent reference to the sectional bicycle maps, published in Leipsic.

If one is going to travel in England it is very desirable to become a member of the English Touring Club (C. T. C.), and it will be better to secure one's membership through the United States Consul (Mr. Frank Weston of Boston), before leaving this country. In this way one has her membership ticket ready for immediate use on landing; and having secured the road and hand books of the club, she can from them more easily plan a trip.

The road-book gives routes all over England, with mileage and minute descriptions of the roads; the hand-book is very useful in giving addresses of local consuls and name of club hotels.

C. T. C. membership entitles one to reduced rates at club hotels. These hotels are almost invariably good, usually the best the town affords.

There are two essentials for a successful trip still unmentioned—a pocket-book not large; and last, but most important of all, a companion whose congeniality has previously been put to the proof.

COMFORT readers, however—that is, the mass of them—will pass their vacations on this side. But remember there is a great deal of enjoyment to be had in a week's trip a-wheel in our country districts and broad prairies.

Somebody has been collecting the superstitions that pertain to a bicycle. It seems that bicycling superstition, as a special and altogether distinct form of superstition, is a recognized fact of the road.

Naturally there are many ridiculous beliefs with which men and women are afflicted that they carry into cycling with them, such as the carrying of some lucky pocket piece or charm.

Such notions are not, however, distinctive as cycling superstition. They were born in the mind of their victims before they ever rode a wheel. There are some superstitions, though, that are peculiar to cyclists.

One of the most common is that about turning around. The academy-taught rider always, and the average rider usually, prefers a turn to the left. In their neophyte days most riders have met with a fall because of attempting to turn to the right, and this has led many into a fearful state of mind that makes them prefer to dismount rather than risk the consequence of a turn to the right.

The consequence is that the superstition about turning around is not only the most common, but also the most dangerous. There have been many mishaps on the road due to the inability of a rider to wheel right about, or his obstinacy in trying to wheel about left.

One man, who asserts to be a philosopher, says that he is not superstitious, and is especially innocent of the old country superstition about crossing a funeral, but he admits that he always waits until one passes, just out of respect for the circumstances. Then he tells with grave earnestness a story that details how he rode along Fifth Avenue and encountered "a funeral cortege" that was crossing at 9th street. He slowed his wheel and questioned himself concerning whether or not he should cross it. While he was deliberating, two other cyclists traveling in opposite directions attempted to cross between the carriages. They collided and fell, and one was struck by the hoofs of a funeral coach horse and severely hurt. This happening, he thinks, justified the deference that is not superstition.

A stout man of my acquaintance knows that every time he wears a certain shirt he is bound to get a puncture, and some of his friends tell a story about his having missed a century run because this puncture-causing shirt was the only clean one that he possessed.

Still more comical in the line of puncture superstition is that of a man who chews gum to prevent punctures. The use of chewing gum for repairing punctures is well known, but this individual, who is an expert billiardist, to use his own expression, "gives that play a grand discount."

He is a twin in superstition to the man who believes that if he forgets his umbrella it is bound to rain, but that he can prevent the clouds from weeping by carrying it. In his own words his story is: "I am a gum-chewing fiend, and the two times when I got punctures were the only two times for months that I was out riding without any in my mouth. It may seem foolish, but I won't mount my wheel now until I have a wad of gum in my mouth."

There is a rider, too, who will not pump his tires before going out, believing that if they have not remained hard it presages misfortune; and there are said to be others who entertain similar sentiments concerning filling a lamp and oiling bearings. This class of rider thinks that if he has neglected to have his wheel in perfect condition for an immediate mount he should not venture forth.

It is a common notion which amounts to a superstition that the only way to start on a trip is to conceive the idea suddenly, grab one's wheel and mount it without examining any part. So many good times have been had following impromptu starts of this kind that hundreds believe any other kind of a start to be unlucky.

One of the curiosities that will abound at the great exposition in Paris next summer will be the "great human fly of Berlin." This is a young woman who rides head downward, suspended from the ceiling. We already have all sorts of bicycle freaks over here, but it has remained for Annette Paula, a German girl, to out-do them all. She has a track built from a ceiling seventy-five feet high and calmly rides her wheel over it suspended bottom side up and darts about like a human fly. A stout net is stretched below about twenty-five feet to catch her in case of accident. She uses an ordinary diamond frame wheel attached by some sort of harness to a track. She also has a stout leather belt and two steel rods well padded from her shoulders that fasten her securely to the wheel. To say that she creates a sensation is putting it mildly.

HUMAN BICYCLE FLY.

It will be remembered that in a recent issue I gave a hint that farmers' wives might knit bicycle stockings for pay. Mrs. A Hamilton of Breckinridge, Minn., would be pleased to hear from any one desiring such work done.

As I have repeatedly said, it is impossible to give addresses of manufacturers of specialties in this department. They properly belong in the advertising columns.

Where Money and Jewels are Kept.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

The DESIRE to be rich, to accumulate possessions, is a natural one and has always existed from the earliest times of which we have any record.

To be sure being rich has not always implied what it does now, and there have been various forms of riches, from the rude money of the ancient savages, to the stocks and bonds of this latter day.

But whatever stood for wealth has been greedily sought for by all. It might he herds of cattle, weapons of warfare, the ownership of land, boats, canoes, or ships; the saving of money, the accumulation of gems or works of art.

In the old days possession gave power, and in a limited degree, possibly, this is true at the present time, and has always been true. To gain possessions men have fought, labored, planned, and given the best part of their life. The methods they have employed have differed as the times in which they have lived have been different, but the end sought for has been still the same.

But with the accumulation of possession comes the added care and responsibility. Once gained it must be looked after, and means devised to keep it safe. One can have nothing in this world, without having at the same time a feeling of responsibility, and care becomes a constant companion.

In the savage days men made forays on their neighbors' lands and drove away all the cattle and herds. Forever after they must be on guard lest they in turn be robbed, and lose by violence and theft what they had gained in that same way. In these days there is no more feeling of security. If one acquires a piece of property, there is first the question of a clear title. Then comes the fear of loss by fire, flood or whirlwind. Does the young woman obtain a few thousand dollars' worth of gems and precious stones? Her dreams are of burglars, and she is in fear lest she lose her valued possessions. That seems to be, if it may be so expressed, a part of the price of wealth.

It is to restore as far as may be, the feeling of security, that so many plans of caring for this accumulation of riches have been devised.

The various "Title Insurance" companies that exist in every city of any size were formed to examine all titles to real estate, so that when one wishes to purchase a piece of property he may by the outlay of a few dollars, have the titles officially examined by men who understand the methods, and if they pronounce the title valid, the property may be safely purchased.

Then there are the fire insurances, with which all are familiar; the marine insurances, which insure ships and their cargoes, lessening danger of loss to those who follow the sea for a livelihood, and risk money on the ocean traffic; the hurricane insurance clause in connection with fire insurance, which insures against cyclones and other destructive storms. This is well as far as it goes, but what safety is there for the personal property, the money, the bonds and securities? The best in the world. It is to care for all such property that the Trust companies have been organized in all the cities in the Union. Some cities, like New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Boston have several of these companies. They are incorporated under State laws, and are subject to the same supervision by the Bank Commissioners as are all National and Savings Banks.

Their object is to do a general Banking and Trust company business. They receive money on deposit and allow interest on it, they give special rates of interest on time deposits, they are a legal depository for trust funds, corporations, firms and individuals; they accept trusts created by will, or otherwise, and assume the care and management of property, and collection of incomes, act as trustee under mortgages of any railroad or corporation, and as transfer agent of the stock of incorporated companies.

You see the work covers a great deal of ground. Although these Trust companies exist, as has been said, in every city, I have chosen one of Boston for description, as it embodies all the newest features of bank architecture, and is absolutely fire, water and burglar proof.

The building itself is very beautiful. It is of rich dark Quincy granite and pale yellow Indiana limestone, the combination giving an exquisite effect of color. The interior is all in tiling and mosaic, the floors being beautifully inlaid, while the walls show the most graceful designs. The stairways are of marble, and the railings of brass. There is very little wood used so that fire would have next to nothing to feed on. But the most wonderful part is that devoted to the vaults where all the valuables are kept.

There is one man only in this country who is an accepted bank vault builder; these vaults were built under his personal supervision, and are pronounced the most thoroughly constructed ever attempted.

And yet they look so airy and light, with the outer wall of tiling, the soft gray of the steel, the electric lights, the spacious rooms, and the air so pure and dry, unlike that of the ordinary vault; that it is not until you begin to look about and examine that you realize how strong it all is.

And this is the way the vault is built.

In the first place there is a wall of two feet of solid masonry. Then there is a cage made of interlocked railroad iron rails surrounding the vaults on all sides, front, back, top, bottom, sides and vestibules, inside the wall of masonry. These bars of iron are not riveted, in the old-fashioned manner, but are bent and welded, so that the joining is invisible. The iron surface is then thickly covered with cement, to cover any interstice which may be between the interlocked iron; then the whole is lined with plates of Crone steel, thoroughly tested and proven drill proof. The two outside vault doors are eight and a quarter inches thick, of solid metal, fastened by a combination of locks that would defy any burglar.

Inside the vault are little coupon rooms, where any depositor may sit, entirely concealed and securely locked, and cut coupons.

At the entrance are the vaults, inside the heavy grills of iron, which are locked, but swing open at the touch of the attendant to give entrance to the vault. But no one is allowed inside who is not known to the guard, and he must answer the description which, if he is a depositor, the guard has against his name.

Behind these polished steel grills, with their doors, is the deposit vault, holding several thousand boxes of various sizes which rent according to size from ten dollars to two hundred and fifty a year. Each of these boxes has a different lock, and none of them can be unlocked, except the master key be first applied. This key is kept by the guardian of the vault, and when a box renter wishes to open his box he notifies the guardian who unlocks the governing lock with the master key, and then the renter's key finishes the work.

There are several boxes which are known as trustee's boxes. These have three or more locks, according to the number of trustees who are interested. Each trustee has a separate key, and the box cannot be opened without the master key, and both of the other keys. Consequently no one trustee can open the box, except in the presence of the fellow trustee, and both, in the presence of the guardian.

Thus every precaution in the interest of honesty is taken.

There are inner vaults for the storing of plate, valuable bric-a-brac, and jewelry. Every woman of society who has valuable gems keeps them in the deposit vaults. They are very seldom out of their resting places. They certainly are not taken away with the owners when they go to other cities or to fashionable watering places. It often happens that the woman who has a fortune in jewels, has them reproduced in brilliants, and that it is these that she wears at the splendid functions which she graces with her presence. Mind you, she does not wear anything but the reproduction of what she owns; she is not going to risk the real ones by wearing them generally, or keeping them in her own private safe.

The locks to the immense doors are marvels of ingenuity, and of the lockmakers' art. They are set in many ways; sometimes for a certain hour, and they cannot be opened before that hour, no matter how much any one may wish to get inside. And the time lock must be opened before any of the letter or number combinations will work.

So you see the solid masonry defies fire, water and the "thieves who break in and steal." There is no need, in this stronghold, of flooding the vaults with water when the bank is closed, as they do in the Bank of England to insure the safety of the millions of treasure stored there.

And isn't it worth something to have a company that will give peace of mind and a feeling of safety, as well as to guard your possessions?

Anyhow there are a sufficient number of persons who think so to make the Trust Companies handsomely paying institutions.

"There is no great loss without some small gain."

And, yet, notwithstanding all this, it is a real comfort to those of us who haven't large possessions nor are likely to attain them, that we have no worry over what may happen. The ringing of the fire bells at night, the story of some bank robbery or defalcation pass us by, except as we have time to pity those who suffer.

THE CHOICE OF BOOKS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY CHARLES HODGDON.

HOW often we have wished we could go to some one who would be able to advise us what to read. What books to obtain for our guides, what to choose for our companions.

This comes home to those of us especially who never can go to college, either for the reason of the condition of our circumstances, or because it is too late. And we fall to wondering if it is any use to try to educate ourselves; then hope which springs eternal, urges us on and we remember how many of the world's great men were self-educated, how Prof. Dorpfeld never went to college and is the greatest living authority on Greek antiquities. We are reminded that it was only a short time since he lectured at Harvard College, how her most learned professors felt honored to sit at his feet and learn from him who never had received the advantages they had. The world is full of proofs of men who have become learned and great and never had the college degree of A. B. bestowed on them.

We who have toiled and wandered among the wastes of books so long, and lost so much of our lives in our quest, may perhaps give warnings to younger travelers; for the difficulties of literature are as great as those of life itself.

You may ask, will book learning help me to win my living? Of course it will. Some of the ablest men in public affairs could earn their bread as men of letters; Henry Cabot Lodge and many others of our statesmen could without doubt earn large incomes from their literary work. Some of our best business men are accomplished bookmen.

Then again a knowledge of literature and a familiarity with history and facts will enable one to be more influential and to fill a larger position in public affairs. Literature, too, kindles thought and drives away sadness, and creates fortitude to bear the burdens of life.

The great difficulty, then, is to choose the books from the thousands with which our libraries are stocked; it is the multiplicity that makes the choice not an easy task. Now many literary men have prepared lists of books for inquiring readers. Sir John Lubbock, the English scientist and man of letters, made a list of books called, "The Best Hundred Books."

It is questioned if that is a wise course to pursue; many students think that such a course kills individuality, a quality that should be carefully cherished and developed. It is rather better to give a few hints and put the wayfarer on the right track, and let him develop his character himself and so preserve his own individuality.

There are, however, a few books written about books which will give an insight into which ones you should read and own. Frederic Harrison, the English historical student and critic, has written two books which are invaluable to one who would be started right, "The Choice of Books" and "The Meaning of History," which will open up the way. It would also be hard to find a better list of books than Ralph Waldo Emerson describes in his essay entitled "Books."

After you obtain your books, you should read them, which alas! many do not. One potent reason is because they do not get books printed with good type. Not one person in one hundred, I venture, realizes that they would read a book with good print where they lay aside a book printed with small, battered and worn out type. You will be surprised how much pride and satisfaction you will take in books with sharp, clear type, good paper and good binding. There are publishers who make it their aim to get their books up in a neat, workmanlike manner and with exquisite taste. The Globe edition of the poets, Shakespeare, Milton, Burns, Spencer, Wordsworth, Shelley, etc., are a delight to handle. Then there are the Bohn Libraries, which contain translations of nearly all the ancient Classics, which Emerson and Carlyle took pains to recommend to their readers. These editions are all inexpensive. Do not think of getting those miserable twenty-five cent wood pulp, abominably printed books. You cannot get interested in their contents and you conclude you are to blame, when it is really the fault of the books.

You can get good books very reasonably if you only know how to set about it. If you live away from a large city, insist that your dealer gets what you want. If there is no book-dealer in your town, a letter addressed to the large publishing houses in New York, asking for their catalogue, will give you a chance to make a selection. If you have a bookseller he will be glad to procure these catalogues for you.

Now the point is not that every one should have a large number of books, but it is that they should have the right ones; fifty well-chosen books would be a little treasury.

Charles Eliot Norton, professor of Fine Arts at Harvard University, once said that Homer, Dante, Shakespeare and Milton were enough to make any one a valuable citizen. Emerson says:

"Consider what you have in the smallest chosen library. A company of the wisest and wittiest men that could be picked out of all civil countries in a thousand years have set in best order the results of their learning and wisdom. The men themselves were hid and inaccessible, solitary, impatient of interruption, fenced by etiquette, but the thought which they did not uncover to their bosom friend is here written out in transparent words to us, the strangers of another age."

Furthermore a book worth reading once is worth reading twice, and the masterpieces you can read a thousand times.

Rufus Choate, one of America's most noted lawyers, it is said, attributed his success to the fact that he managed someway to get an hour a day to read a standard book. He was busier than most of us. Now cannot you manage to read one half-hour each day? If you read one book from Homer's Iliad, or a book from Virgil's Aeneid or something from Tennyson or Wordsworth, say the lines on Tintern each day and multiply that by three hundred and sixty-five, you would make such progress you would surprise yourself, be a source of pride to your friends, and a help to the world.

Do not neglect the Ancient Classics because you cannot read Latin and Greek. Mr. Emerson says he would as soon swim across a river, instead of going over on the bridge, as to read a book in the original, when he could get it in the mother tongue.

Be not discouraged because you may forget what you read; it is no more necessary to remember where you obtained your intellectual food, than it is to be able to recall what you have eaten, in order to know your bodily strength.

Literature is one of the instruments of mankind; can you afford to let others arm themselves, while you are defenseless? "Armed with reason and braced with knowledge", stand forth in all the panoply of steadfastness and courage.

A New Illuminant.

FOR the same degree of light from the new acetylene gas, there is much less heat given out than from the common illuminating gas. The illuminating power to a cubic foot of gas is as twelve of acetylene to one of the common kind. The incandescent electric lamp at its best illumination casts a shade in the light of the usual acetylene flame of one inch square; while the latter is fully as steady, when supplied from the tanks of liquor the form in which the gas is furnished to customers. When vent is afforded to the contents this expands to gas, making 400 times the bulk of the liquid. It is practically non explosive. The tanks are iron cylinders, with pressure gauge attached. The vent is at the top of the cylinder if upright, or in the upper side, if horizontal—where connection is made by iron, brass, rubber or similar pipe or tubing, with single burner, or with chandelier, or piping for several lights, or even the entire piping of the house. There are also single stationary and portable lamps with tanks connected. So compressible is this gas that a three months' supply for a large house can be stored in a cylinder six inches in diameter and four and a half feet long; and it can be delivered by wagon, or by railroad, express or freight, as the case requires. The price for this quantity of liquified gas is ten dollars—the tank and fixtures being five dollars, and barring accident, will last a lifetime. Fifteen cents' worth of the acetylene liquid will give as much light as a thousand cubic feet of common illuminating gas—the price of which varies from about one dollar to five dollars per thousand. The gas arises directly from the decomposition of water by carbide of calcium—a substance made by fusing coal dust and lime together in an electric furnace.

THE STRIKERS' VICTIM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

"SPEAKING of strikes," remarked my chance acquaintance, as he closed the window and settled himself back in his seat, "calls up an incident in my own experience that has effectually destroyed any sympathy I might otherwise have for either party to such a rupture. Did you notice those old-fashioned mills, or rather, their ruins, about three miles back? Probably not, as in the face of our modern institutions of that nature they are insignificant enough, but in their day they were of considerable importance, I assure you. Why, at one time they were giving employment, directly or otherwise, to about every man in the valley. That was just before the beginning of the strike about which I am going to tell.

"It was forty years ago—oh, yes, we had strikes then sometimes, though they were not under the organized management of the present day. Neither side was answerable for any act, except to the law, which you know in such cases is very apt to be disregarded. I don't remember what first started the controversy. It does not matter, anyway; it was started and all at once the mills were forced to shut down, and the teamsters and farmers suddenly found their source of supply cut off and were compelled to suffer equally with those who were in the strike, though probably the greater part of them never knew what the quarrel was about.

"Things began to look desperate in the course of a week or two for the families that depended on the mills for their living, and the managers decided to send away for what new men were necessary to take the places of those who still refused to work, hoping in this way to, at least, provide employment for their faithful hands. I was offered the position of foreman and promptly accepted it, as I was at that time young and of just the right disposition to rather enjoy the prospect of a contest with the strikers, coupled with no little personal risk.

"The evening of the day on which I received the offer found me at the station we have just passed, awaiting the arrival of the train up the branch from the mills. The train was long past due and in my eagerness to reach the scene of my future labors every minute I was forced to wait seemed fully equal to ten.

"'Waiting to go up to the mills?' said a voice beside me. 'It's no use to-night. They dars'n't run the train. You see the men have word that a new foreman is to come up this evening and they have made a vow that he won't reach there unless he walks over. The engineers all know the men mean business and you may take my word for it, there won't a train go up the branch to-night.'

"I ought to have known better than to fall into the trap set for me, especially as I felt at the time the fellow was lying, but somehow the over-due train and my own impatience prompted me to act on a course that my better judgment could not for a moment have endorsed; that is, walk.

"It was now quite dark; that is, as dark as it would become, for there was a full moon. With my attention divided between indignation at this early interference with my discharge of my duties and an attempt to formulate some course of action appropriate for the morrow, (which I now felt convinced would bring an open contest), I walked rapidly up the track, and in the course of half an hour found myself at a lofty trestle less than a mile from the mill.

"Probably my attention was almost anywhere except where it ought to have been—on my own surroundings. At this point I was suddenly startled by an unnatural flash of light before my eyes, followed by absolute darkness. Half unconscious as I was I vaguely realized the exact cause of it all. I had been approached from behind and struck with a club or some such weapon. When I came to myself it was to face some half-dozen rough, hard faces and to find that I was bound and gagged.

"'Fool!' hissed one of them in my ear. 'You thought the train would never come, but it is coming, and your own miserable carcass shall be made to hurl it from the trestle to its destruction. Hark! Do you hear it?'

"Yes, I could hear it thundering along far down the valley but every moment getting dreadfully near, for at the same time I realized that my assailants had bound me hand and foot to one of the rails just at the end of the trestle.

"There was no hope and such a death!

"Were you ever forced to lie perfectly helpless and listen to the approach of certain death? I reckon not, nor have I ever had the enemy that I would like to have endure even an instant of the torture I endured that night. It seems to be natural to shun death. It is sometimes difficult to become reconciled after a desperate battle with disease has robbed us of a part of our vitality, and left us less to live for. But to the young, with most of the privileges of life untasted and all life's golden opportunities for action still open, it is even more terrible to give up. Add then, to this, the inability to stand and face death the while his instrument could be distinctly heard approaching and its progress traced with a completeness quite foreign to the subtle advancement of disease, and there is added an actual horror that can never be appreciated until realized. Already I could feel the earth tremble beneath the tread of the approaching monster. My time indeed was very short. The fiends who had placed me there had left the spot, satisfied that they had done their work well. Ah! truly I should never hold the foreman's place in the mills. My head was in such a position that I could not see ahead, but I was sure that I could feel the glare of the headlight, and it added to my terror as it glided up. Would reason stay with me till the end or would the engine strike the body of a madman? And then, a soft hand touched my own and a young girl's face, the loveliest that I have ever seen before or since, bent over me while those white hands tore wildly at the fastenings that bound me. The train came nearer, nearer, was upon us, almost, but the knots would not yield. 'My God! Too late!' She almost shrieked. 'My father. Forgive him, won't you, for my sake?'

"One moment she stood there, I well knew imploring forgiveness for the man whose hands had helped secure me there, and the next, the train had come. Stupidly I watched it glide up, on, on, across the trestle and finally come to a standstill.

"Indistinctly I heard the trainmen running back to where I lay. Dimly I realized that they were cutting the ropes; that I was free. And the girl; the beautiful face: why did not she return? Suddenly there flashed upon me a certain degree of returning sense and I sprang to my feet. Alas! Full well I realized the whole truth then. The track was double and my captors by mistake had tied me on the wrong track. But the girl, in that step back during her last appeal for the father whose deed she abhored, had placed herself in the way of the locomotive and been knocked from the trestle.

"True to the memory of that appeal I never have yet divulged the name of my captor of that night, though I thought at the time he would have preferred to have me do so.

"At the funeral of the single victim of his plot the element of lawlessness died away among the strikers and peace was restored. The same day I severed my connections with the place forever.

"Sometimes—to-day for instance—there is a longing to go to that grave but something always seems to stand before me and motion me back, and I have never gone.

"That, then, is why I have so little sympathy with either side in labor troubles when violence is resorted to. For in a moment I had learned to love that girl and to hate all that for the sake of the gain could cause so much of purity and truth and innocence to suffer."

Wireless Telegraphy.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ONLY a short time ago the world was startled by a series of successful experiments which were held which demonstrated the possibility of wireless telegraphy. The spot chosen for the experiments was on the shores of Long Island, and water was the medium used for carrying the current.

Two copper plates were submerged in the salt water, several miles apart, and were connected by an insulated copper wire. The circuit also contained a battery and a telegraph key. The current from the battery, then, when the key was closed, passed from the battery to the end of the wire, to the submerged copper plate, and then back to the other copper plate and the battery through the water.

A current passing through the water does not go back in a straight line, but spreads out in radiating rays, as do the ripples of water when one throws a stone into a quiet pond. So the water between the two submerged copper plates is permeated in all directions by the electrical current.

To illustrate this point more fully, take a straight bar magnet and lay it upon a table. Cover it with a sheet of paper and sprinkle upon this iron filings. Tap the paper gently and the filings will distribute themselves in the same manner that the current distributes itself through the water.

On this principle it has been demonstrated that an impulse sent through a shore wire ten miles long can be felt ten miles from shore.

By means of a receiver dropped into the water within the area covered by the radiation of the impulses, the message of the shore wire may be read. For very long distances, delicate instruments, such as are used for taking messages from ocean cables, would need to be used; for comparatively short distances a telephone receiver, with its resistance greatly reduced was found to fill all needs.

To the telephone receiver, connected by insulated wires, were attached two copper plates which were hung in the water parallel to the shore wire and in the area of the radiating impulses. The opening and the closing of the telegraph key on shore could then be plainly heard.

The inventors or discoverers were satisfied that their theories in regard to this matter were correct, and though the experiment did no more than convince them that they were in the right track, it was regarded as highly important and most significant.

THE CHOICE OF BOOKS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY CHARLES HODGDON.

HOW often we have wished we could go to some one who would be able to advise us what to read. What books to obtain for our guides, what to choose for our companions.

This comes home to those of us especially who never can go to college, either for the reason of the condition of our circumstances, or because it is too late. And we fall to wondering if it is any use to try to educate ourselves; then hope which springs eternal, urges us on and we remember how many of the world's great men were self-educated, how Prof. Dorpfeld never went to college and is the greatest living authority on Greek antiquities. We are reminded that it was only a short time since he lectured at Harvard College, how her most learned professors felt honored to sit at his feet and learn from him who never had received the advantages they had. The world is full of proofs of men who have become learned and great and never had the college degree of A. B. bestowed on them.

We who have toiled and wandered among the wastes of books so long, and lost so much of our lives in our quest, may perhaps give warnings to younger travelers; for the difficulties of literature are as great as those of life itself.

You may ask, will book learning help me to win my living? Of course it will. Some of the ablest men in public affairs could earn their bread as men of letters; Henry Cabot Lodge and many others of our statesmen could without doubt earn large incomes from their literary work. Some of our best business men are accomplished bookmen.

Then again a knowledge of literature and a familiarity with history and facts will enable one to be more influential and to fill a larger position in public affairs. Literature, too, kindles thought and drives away sadness, and creates fortitude to bear the burdens of life.

The great difficulty, then, is to choose the books from the thousands with which our libraries are stocked; it is the multiplicity that makes the choice not an easy task. Now many literary men have prepared lists of books for inquiring readers. Sir John Lubbock, the English scientist and man of letters, made a list of books called, "The Best Hundred Books."

It is questioned if that is a wise course to pursue; many students think that such a course kills individuality, a quality that should be carefully cherished and developed. It is rather better to give a few hints and put the wayfarer on the right track, and let him develop his character himself and so preserve his own individuality.

There are, however, a few books written about books which will give an insight into which ones you should read and own. Frederic Harrison, the English historical student and critic, has written two books which are invaluable to one who would be started right, "The Choice of Books" and "The Meaning of History," which will open up the way. It would also be hard to find a better list of books than Ralph Waldo Emerson describes in his essay entitled "Books."

After you obtain your books, you should read them, which alas! many do not. One potent reason is because they do not get books printed with good type. Not one person in one hundred, I venture, realizes that they would read a book with good print where they lay aside a book printed with small, battered and worn out type. You will be surprised how much pride and satisfaction you will take in books with sharp, clear type, good paper and good binding. There are publishers who make it their aim to get their books up in a neat, workmanlike manner and with exquisite taste. The Globe edition of the poets, Shakespeare, Milton, Burns, Spencer, Wordsworth, Shelley, etc., are a delight to handle. Then there are the Bohn Libraries, which contain translations of nearly all the ancient Classics, which Emerson and Carlyle took pains to recommend to their readers. These editions are all inexpensive. Do not think of getting those miserable twenty-five cent wood pulp, abominably printed books. You cannot get interested in their contents and you conclude you are to blame, when it is really the fault of the books.

You can get good books very reasonably if you only know how to set about it. If you live away from a large city, insist that your dealer gets what you want. If there is no book-dealer in your town, a letter addressed to the large publishing houses in New York, asking for their catalogue, will give you a chance to make a selection. If you have a bookseller he will be glad to procure these catalogues for you.

Now the point is not that every one should have a large number of books, but it is that they should have the right ones; fifty well-chosen books would be a little treasury.

Charles Eliot Norton, professor of Fine Arts at Harvard University, once said that Homer, Dante, Shakespeare and Milton were enough to make any one a valuable citizen. Emerson says:

"Consider what you have in the smallest chosen library. A company of the wisest and wittiest men that could be picked out of all civil countries in a thousand years have set in best order the results of their learning and wisdom. The men themselves were hid and inaccessible, solitary, impatient of interruption, fenced by etiquette, but the thought which they did not uncover to their bosom friend is here written out in transparent words to us, the strangers of another age."

Furthermore a book worth reading once is worth reading twice, and the masterpieces you can read a thousand times.

Rufus Choate, one of America's most noted lawyers, it is said, attributed his success to the fact that he managed someway to get an hour a day to read a standard book. He was busier than most of us. Now cannot you manage to read one half-hour each day? If you read one book from Homer's Iliad, or a book from Virgil's Aeneid or something from Tennyson or Wordsworth, say the lines on Tintern each day and multiply that by three hundred and sixty-five, you would make such progress you would surprise yourself, be a source of pride to your friends, and a help to the world.

Do not neglect the Ancient Classics because you cannot read Latin and Greek. Mr. Emerson says he would as soon swim across a river, instead of going over on the bridge, as to read a book in the original, when he could get it in the mother tongue.

Be not discouraged because you may forget what you read; it is no more necessary to remember where you obtained your intellectual food, than it is to be able to recall what you have eaten, in order to know your bodily strength.

Literature is one of the instruments of mankind; can you afford to let others arm themselves, while you are defenseless? "Armed with reason and braced with knowledge", stand forth in all the panoply of steadfastness and courage.

A New Illuminant.

FOR the same degree of light from the new acetylene gas, there is much less heat given out than from the common illuminating gas. The illuminating power to a cubic foot of gas is as twelve of acetylene to one of the common kind. The incandescent electric lamp at its best illumination casts a shade in the light of the usual acetylene flame of one inch square; while the latter is fully as steady, when supplied from the tanks of liquor the form in which the gas is furnished to customers. When vent is afforded to the contents this expands to gas, making 400 times the bulk of the liquid. It is practically non explosive. The tanks are iron cylinders, with pressure gauge attached. The vent is at the top of the cylinder if upright, or in the upper side, if horizontal—where connection is made by iron, brass, rubber or similar pipe or tubing, with single burner, or with chandelier, or piping for several lights, or even the entire piping of the house. There are also single stationary and portable lamps with tanks connected. So compressible is this gas that a three months' supply for a large house can be stored in a cylinder six inches in diameter and four and a half feet long; and it can be delivered by wagon, or by railroad, express or freight, as the case requires. The price for this quantity of liquified gas is ten dollars—the tank and fixtures being five dollars, and barring accident, will last a lifetime. Fifteen cents' worth of the acetylene liquid will give as much light as a thousand cubic feet of common illuminating gas—the price of which varies from about one dollar to five dollars per thousand. The gas arises directly from the decomposition of water by carbide of calcium—a substance made by fusing coal dust and lime together in an electric furnace.

THE STRIKERS' VICTIM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

"SPEAKING of strikes," remarked my chance acquaintance, as he closed the window and settled himself back in his seat, "calls up an incident in my own experience that has effectually destroyed any sympathy I might otherwise have for either party to such a rupture. Did you notice those old-fashioned mills, or rather, their ruins, about three miles back? Probably not, as in the face of our modern institutions of that nature they are insignificant enough, but in their day they were of considerable importance, I assure you. Why, at one time they were giving employment, directly or otherwise, to about every man in the valley. That was just before the beginning of the strike about which I am going to tell.

"It was forty years ago—oh, yes, we had strikes then sometimes, though they were not under the organized management of the present day. Neither side was answerable for any act, except to the law, which you know in such cases is very apt to be disregarded. I don't remember what first started the controversy. It does not matter, anyway; it was started and all at once the mills were forced to shut down, and the teamsters and farmers suddenly found their source of supply cut off and were compelled to suffer equally with those who were in the strike, though probably the greater part of them never knew what the quarrel was about.

"Things began to look desperate in the course of a week or two for the families that depended on the mills for their living, and the managers decided to send away for what new men were necessary to take the places of those who still refused to work, hoping in this way to, at least, provide employment for their faithful hands. I was offered the position of foreman and promptly accepted it, as I was at that time young and of just the right disposition to rather enjoy the prospect of a contest with the strikers, coupled with no little personal risk.

"The evening of the day on which I received the offer found me at the station we have just passed, awaiting the arrival of the train up the branch from the mills. The train was long past due and in my eagerness to reach the scene of my future labors every minute I was forced to wait seemed fully equal to ten.

"'Waiting to go up to the mills?' said a voice beside me. 'It's no use to-night. They dars'n't run the train. You see the men have word that a new foreman is to come up this evening and they have made a vow that he won't reach there unless he walks over. The engineers all know the men mean business and you may take my word for it, there won't a train go up the branch to-night.'

"I ought to have known better than to fall into the trap set for me, especially as I felt at the time the fellow was lying, but somehow the over-due train and my own impatience prompted me to act on a course that my better judgment could not for a moment have endorsed; that is, walk.

"It was now quite dark; that is, as dark as it would become, for there was a full moon. With my attention divided between indignation at this early interference with my discharge of my duties and an attempt to formulate some course of action appropriate for the morrow, (which I now felt convinced would bring an open contest), I walked rapidly up the track, and in the course of half an hour found myself at a lofty trestle less than a mile from the mill.

"Probably my attention was almost anywhere except where it ought to have been—on my own surroundings. At this point I was suddenly startled by an unnatural flash of light before my eyes, followed by absolute darkness. Half unconscious as I was I vaguely realized the exact cause of it all. I had been approached from behind and struck with a club or some such weapon. When I came to myself it was to face some half-dozen rough, hard faces and to find that I was bound and gagged.

"'Fool!' hissed one of them in my ear. 'You thought the train would never come, but it is coming, and your own miserable carcass shall be made to hurl it from the trestle to its destruction. Hark! Do you hear it?'

"Yes, I could hear it thundering along far down the valley but every moment getting dreadfully near, for at the same time I realized that my assailants had bound me hand and foot to one of the rails just at the end of the trestle.

"There was no hope and such a death!

"Were you ever forced to lie perfectly helpless and listen to the approach of certain death? I reckon not, nor have I ever had the enemy that I would like to have endure even an instant of the torture I endured that night. It seems to be natural to shun death. It is sometimes difficult to become reconciled after a desperate battle with disease has robbed us of a part of our vitality, and left us less to live for. But to the young, with most of the privileges of life untasted and all life's golden opportunities for action still open, it is even more terrible to give up. Add then, to this, the inability to stand and face death the while his instrument could be distinctly heard approaching and its progress traced with a completeness quite foreign to the subtle advancement of disease, and there is added an actual horror that can never be appreciated until realized. Already I could feel the earth tremble beneath the tread of the approaching monster. My time indeed was very short. The fiends who had placed me there had left the spot, satisfied that they had done their work well. Ah! truly I should never hold the foreman's place in the mills. My head was in such a position that I could not see ahead, but I was sure that I could feel the glare of the headlight, and it added to my terror as it glided up. Would reason stay with me till the end or would the engine strike the body of a madman? And then, a soft hand touched my own and a young girl's face, the loveliest that I have ever seen before or since, bent over me while those white hands tore wildly at the fastenings that bound me. The train came nearer, nearer, was upon us, almost, but the knots would not yield. 'My God! Too late!' She almost shrieked. 'My father. Forgive him, won't you, for my sake?'

"One moment she stood there, I well knew imploring forgiveness for the man whose hands had helped secure me there, and the next, the train had come. Stupidly I watched it glide up, on, on, across the trestle and finally come to a standstill.

"Indistinctly I heard the trainmen running back to where I lay. Dimly I realized that they were cutting the ropes; that I was free. And the girl; the beautiful face: why did not she return? Suddenly there flashed upon me a certain degree of returning sense and I sprang to my feet. Alas! Full well I realized the whole truth then. The track was double and my captors by mistake had tied me on the wrong track. But the girl, in that step back during her last appeal for the father whose deed she abhored, had placed herself in the way of the locomotive and been knocked from the trestle.

"True to the memory of that appeal I never have yet divulged the name of my captor of that night, though I thought at the time he would have preferred to have me do so.

"At the funeral of the single victim of his plot the element of lawlessness died away among the strikers and peace was restored. The same day I severed my connections with the place forever.

"Sometimes—to-day for instance—there is a longing to go to that grave but something always seems to stand before me and motion me back, and I have never gone.

"That, then, is why I have so little sympathy with either side in labor troubles when violence is resorted to. For in a moment I had learned to love that girl and to hate all that for the sake of the gain could cause so much of purity and truth and innocence to suffer."

Wireless Telegraphy.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ONLY a short time ago the world was startled by a series of successful experiments which were held which demonstrated the possibility of wireless telegraphy. The spot chosen for the experiments was on the shores of Long Island, and water was the medium used for carrying the current.

Two copper plates were submerged in the salt water, several miles apart, and were connected by an insulated copper wire. The circuit also contained a battery and a telegraph key. The current from the battery, then, when the key was closed, passed from the battery to the end of the wire, to the submerged copper plate, and then back to the other copper plate and the battery through the water.

A current passing through the water does not go back in a straight line, but spreads out in radiating rays, as do the ripples of water when one throws a stone into a quiet pond. So the water between the two submerged copper plates is permeated in all directions by the electrical current.

To illustrate this point more fully, take a straight bar magnet and lay it upon a table. Cover it with a sheet of paper and sprinkle upon this iron filings. Tap the paper gently and the filings will distribute themselves in the same manner that the current distributes itself through the water.

On this principle it has been demonstrated that an impulse sent through a shore wire ten miles long can be felt ten miles from shore.

By means of a receiver dropped into the water within the area covered by the radiation of the impulses, the message of the shore wire may be read. For very long distances, delicate instruments, such as are used for taking messages from ocean cables, would need to be used; for comparatively short distances a telephone receiver, with its resistance greatly reduced was found to fill all needs.

To the telephone receiver, connected by insulated wires, were attached two copper plates which were hung in the water parallel to the shore wire and in the area of the radiating impulses. The opening and the closing of the telegraph key on shore could then be plainly heard.

The inventors or discoverers were satisfied that their theories in regard to this matter were correct, and though the experiment did no more than convince them that they were in the right track, it was regarded as highly important and most significant.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

COUSIN MARION.

Now comes the blowy month of March, cousins mine, and though it may be ugly and bad, don't give it a thought. Spring is just ahead, and there is sunshine and sweetness, and birdsongs, and rosebuds in that to make the whole world glad. It is a blessed thing to us all, dears, if we can always look out of the shadows into the sunlight beyond; there is always sunlight, if we will only look for it. However, there is something else to do besides talk, so let us see who comes first.

It is from an "Old Maid of Sixteen" who lives in Plattsburg, N. Y., and she wants to know if she should drop a crowd of girls who laugh at her because she refuses to "run after the boys" with them. Yes, yes; drop them quick.

May Rock, Darrow, La.—It is quite proper for a young girl to send valentines to the boys, if the boys are her brothers. Otherwise it is just as well not to.

Bessie E., St. James Parish, La.—Don't send your photograph to a young man or write to him. If you are past twenty you might if you are old friends.

Violet, Manitoba, Can.—All I can say of the kind of trousseau you should get is to have it handsome and within your means and station. If you go East to get married you will have to buy your ticket, even if you use part of it on your bridal tour. A bride wears kid gloves with a satin dress. Married ladies do not act as bridesmaids. Let the young man see what good clothes you have and tell him he won't have to buy any for you till he is able. The house where you board should furnish the linen.

Bertha K. of far away St. Mary's, Colorado, has my thanks for a very nice letter she writes me.

Nellie Gray, Blue Ridge, Ga.—If people truly love each other it does not make any difference what they look like, or what size they are or what age. You are worrying about non-essentials. Thirty for the man and twenty for the woman are excellent marrying ages. Certainly I believe God intended certain people to marry. If He hadn't, they wouldn't have married. Yes I have kissed my sweetheart; or rather he has kissed me, but that was long, long ago.

Daisy, Newport, Ky.—It is hard to say where you could find a school where you could work for your education. The only way to find one is to get school advertisements from the magazines and write personal letters to the principals offering your services.

Questioner, Rochester, N. Y.—It is not necessary to rap on the door of a public office before entering. (2) There is no truth in fortune-tellers. (3) It is better for a girl of seventeen to wear her hair up.

Lula, Van Buren, Ind.—Nothing will prevent perspiration of the face except cold or absolute quiet. There is no complexion powder that perspiration will not spoil. (2) Actresses use paints and stains of all kinds, and no one kind very long.

Bere and Tella, De Soto, Ia.—It is quite proper for a lady to accept a gentleman's attention, notwithstanding he has for a time been paying attention to another. (2) Let any man go who hasn't mind enough to know whether it is you or another he admires the more. What do you want with that kind of a man?

Lena, Coffeyville, Ark.—It is proper to return all presents when you and the young man have broken with each other.

Butterfly, New Pine Creek, Ore.—It is not proper for a girl of fifteen to go sleighing with a young man, nor to take her friend's beau away from her, nor to go to dances or to kissing games, nor to be kissed good night. Neither should eleven year old kids read love stories.

Patty, Chilhowie, Va.—You say you are eighteen and engaged, but will not marry at present because you want to learn to be a trained nurse and work in hospitals. You are making a mistake there, my dear. You might go to a training school for nurses for a term, just to be handy, but that is enough. It is a hard life, even harder than marrying, so let it go except for a term, perhaps.

Sweet Marie of Helena, Mon., says she has been reading my Talks for a long time, and yet she asks me how she shall win the love of a young man who doesn't care for her, when I have said a thousand times, I guess, that it cannot be done, unless she is rich and he is for sale, and then he is lying when he says it. Neither man's nor woman's love can be won. It goeth only where it listeth.

Sweet Sixteen, Auburn, Ind.—So called Love Powders, may be harmless to the body, but they are deadly poison to the mind. Let them alone. (2) The events in your life cannot be foretold. (3) If, as you say, everybody in Auburn kisses everybody else good night, it must be proper. At least, in Auburn. It isn't so in this town.

Prudence, Shawtown, Ohio.—The sentiment of your poetry is all right, but don't write any more poetry until you have read the best English and American poets.

Esther, Saratoga, N. Y.—Don't worry over the kisses you lost in the crowd that laughed at you. And stay away from the place where you lost them. There is such a thing as too much familiarity among friends.

Blue Eyes, Falmouth, Va.—Study your books and don't ask questions about the boys till you are out of your teens.

Blue and Gray, Des Moines, Ia.—You write like very sensible girls, indeed, and I do not see why you are not fairly run away with by the young men. I think it would be wiser if you made no especial effort to meet young men. You are young yet and the Lord will send the right ones to you in due time. If He does not, you will never be unhappy over it.

Cousin Grace Ladd of St. Louis, Mo., requests the cousins to send any Red Cross literature they may have, or any articles about Miss Clara Barton to Mrs. M. J. Metzger, Collinsville, Ill.

Mamie, Quitman, Miss.—Schools of photography are few and far between and I do not know the address of one. Write to some of the photograph people who advertise and they may be able to tell you. I think photography is the best work for women and I do hope you will learn how and make a great success of it.

Annette O., Pittsburg, Tenn.—A husband cannot dispose of real estate on mortgage or sale without the wife's signature, which means her consent.

Lizzie C., Midland, Tenn.—I do not know the address of the electric oil painters you ask about. Ask the owners of the samples you saw.

Cousin Allie Schofield of Ten Mile, Ark., would like to have suggestions from the cousins for the organization and conducting of a reading circle in her neighborhood.

Cupid, Napa, Cal.—You would not be happy if you married the young man you ask about. Wait three or four years. (2) It is quite proper for a gentleman to help a lady on with her jacket. (3) A caller should go home not later than half-past ten o'clock.

Lonely Girl, Bleda, Mo.—Do not marry the other man until you have asked the man you have loved since you were a little girl. Sometimes these older men don't quite understand that the children they knew have grown to maturity.

Howard, Bremond, Texas.—The sample you send is not quite poetry, but it has merit, if the ideas are all your own.

Frances, Saratoga, N. Y.—You should neither permit a young man whom you do not know to put on your skates or to skate with you. Have you no acquaintances who could extend such courtesies? (2) The hair is brown.

Phœby G., Ascalon, Ga.—Since you are so sure that this rich gentleman of sixty would be perfectly willing to make you the mistress of his fine mansion if he knew you wanted to be, why not delicately ask him for the high honor? Nothing venture, nothing have, you know.

F. D. G., Meadow Station, Va.—Write to Charles Gillette, 15th and H. Streets, Washington, D. C., for the information you seek.

Anxiety, Pleasanton, Ks.—There is no way open to you except to wait five years and trust in Providence.

Cousin Emily of St. Paul, Minn., informs Cousins Gladys and Muriel that the National flower of Germany is the Bachelor Button, Die Kornblume. She asks what is the national flower of Austria. Who can tell?

Inquisitive, Ankeney, Ia.—A young lady should not accept a ring from a man unless engaged to him. (2) A lady has no right to be impolite to a man simply because she doesn't like him, so long as he is polite. (3) Yes. (4) A young woman may become a successful doctor of medicine and I should advise her to become one if she can. (5) Yes. (6) Under some circumstances. (7 and 8) No.

Flower, Mt. Vernon, Mo.—Seventeen year old girls can get along very nicely without beaux. (2) Give your mother a chance. (3) You might accept the escort of boy friends if your brothers will not take their place.

Reader, Covington, Va.—It isn't necessary for the man to say anything when he offers his arm to a lady. (2) She might accept slight assistance in going up or down steps, if she is old and feeble. (3) There is no "best work" on etiquette. Observation and practice do the work. Any book on etiquette will give all the points needed.

Inquirer, Falls Mills, Va.—There is nothing new in inscriptions for engagement rings. The old ones cannot be improved on.

Violet, aged fifteen, of South Manchester, Conn., asks me so many questions that all I can say is she must get her knowledge of them by growing older, which she cannot help doing for they are questions any girl of sixteen ought to know.

There, my dears, all of you are answered and it has taken so much space that I can only say by-by till next month, and the Lord keep you.

COUSIN MARION.

Women's Clubs.

CLUBS for women are not of so recent date as might be imagined. As far back in the history of this country as 1685 the clergy of New England advised their female parishioners to meet together to study scriptural topics, and accordingly there were many weekly meetings of the good sisters for this purpose, which were, no doubt, edifying to the participants. In the eighteenth century there were quilting parties at which one of the ladies read aloud while the others worked. Theological writings were given the first place, but poetry and fiction were occasionally allowed. Then the town-meeting gave an opportunity to the woman property-holder to both speak and vote. Prayer-meetings and experience-meetings, conference-meetings and class-meetings also gave women many a chance to speak their minds openly. Then came, in the present century, "literary evenings;" and at last, after the close of the civil war, came the urgent need of women's clubs, pure and simple. The Sorosis of New York, the Woman's Club in Boston and Brooklyn were started as experiments, but their success was so great that now women's clubs are everywhere, their name is legion, and their influence for good is felt in every corner of our land.

SILK spun by shell fish! this sounds incredible, but it is a fact that the "pinna" in the Mediterranean has the power of spinning a viscid silk which is made into handsome fabric in Sicily. The material is gathered from the rocks at low tide, washed in soap and water, dried, straightened and carded,—one pound of the coarse filament yielding three ounces of fine thread, which, when spun, is of a burnished, golden brown color.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

URING the cold weather candy can be more easily made and kept, than when it is warm, and nowadays many people prefer to make their own candy, particularly when there are children to eat it, as then it is known to be absolutely wholesome.

There is a "knack" at candy making, which comes only with experience. One may give an absolutely correct and minute resume of everything she does and every ingredient she uses in making delicious candy, and someone else may follow directions exactly, and yet the result will be anything but satisfactory. There is much that cannot be told—that must be learned from experience.

The length of time for cooking depends largely on the kind of fire and the temperature, as evaporation takes place fast or slow, according to the atmosphere; therefore, it is next to impossible to tell any one just how long to boil the mixture, and yet everything depends upon just that one thing—the boiling.

In previous numbers we have given recipes for Candied Orange Peel, Fudge, Maple Cream with Nuts, and other delicious confections. Now comes Maple Sugar with Walnuts, which fairly melts in the mouth. To make this, boil, without stirring, one pound maple sugar, grated, with one-half cup boiling water, until a little, taken up and cooled, can be made into a soft ball, between the thumb and finger. Take from the fire and stir until thick enough to drop from a spoon in round shape. Press a walnut meat into each round before it hardens.

VELVET MOLASSES CANDY.

Put into a kettle one cup molasses, three cups sugar, one cup boiling water and three tablespoons vinegar. As soon as the boiling point is reached add one-half teaspoon cream of tartar. Boil until, when tried in cold water, the mixture is brittle. Stir constantly, when in this stage, and when about done add one-half cup melted butter and one-fourth teaspoon soda. Pour into buttered pan to cool, and then pull. Just before pulling, add one-half teaspoon lemon extract, or one teaspoon vanilla, or, if the flavor is liked, a few drops of oil of peppermint.

So many people really like peppermint that a reliable recipe for making peppermint drops may be of use to some one.

PEPPERMINTS.

Put one and one-half cups sugar, and one-half cup boiling water into a saucepan and stir until sugar dissolves. Boil ten minutes; remove from fire, add six drops oil of peppermint and beat until of right consistency to drop from the tip of a spoon onto buttered paper in small round particles.

Vanilla wafers are pastry, but are so delicate as to seem more like candy. They may be made into delicate rolls, as shown in our illustration, or cut into small fancy shapes with the little cutters now so much in use. Those in the shape of a star are attractive, also the heart, diamond, club and spade shapes, which are only an inch and a half wide.

Cream one-third cup butter and lard in equal proportions; add one cup of sugar, one well-beaten egg, one-fourth cup of milk and two teaspoons vanilla. Mix and sift two and one-half cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder and one-half teaspoon salt. Add to first mixture, chill thoroughly and then take one-fourth the mixture at a time onto the board. Roll very thin and cut with fancy cutters. Bake on a sheet in a moderate oven.

The round red Edom cheese makes a very good serving dish, after the cheese has all been taken out. From this may be served macaroni or spaghetti, mixed with grated cheese and tomato sauce—or cooked fresh fish, warmed up in white sauce. The shell may be used several times, as it is very hard, and can easily be rinsed out with lukewarm water, after serving, care being used regarding the color on the outside, however, as it sometimes runs down onto napkins or serving doileys.

CHEESE SHELL.

Speaking of cheese reminds me of some dainty cheese sandwiches served at a luncheon, a short time since, and which were served hot. They were made by cutting a slice of bread of medium thickness into oblong shape—and with a sharp knife removing a square out of the center, leaving a shallow box. Fit into the box a thin slice of American cheese, season with salt and paprica, fit the cover on to the box, brush over with the white of egg and brown in hot fat. Drain on paper and serve at once. If preferred, the sandwiches may be prepared as above and toasted, instead of fried.

A Curious Error That Led Columbus to Undertake His Voyage of Discovery.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

T an early period the subject of the earth's size had stirred the minds of thinking men. Various ancient investigators had by different methods reached measurements more or less near the truth; these methods were continued into the middle ages, supplemented by new thought, and among the more striking results were those obtained by Roger Bacon and Gerbert, afterward Pope Sylvester II. They handed down to after-time the torch of knowledge, but, as their reward among their contemporaries, they fell under the charge of sorcery.

Far more consonant with the theological spirit of the middle ages was a solution of the problem from Scripture, and this solution deserves to be given as an example of a very curious theological error, chancing to result in great good. The second book of Esdras, which among Protestants is placed in the Apocrypha, was held by many of the foremost men of the ancient Church as fully inspired; though Jerome looked with suspicion on this book, it was regarded as prophetic by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Ambrose, and the Church acquiesced in that view. In the Eastern Church it held an especially high place, and in the Western Church, before the Reformation, was generally considered by the most eminent authorities to be part of the sacred canon. In the sixth chapter of this book there is a summary of the works of creation, and in this occur the following verses:

"Upon the third day thou dids't command that the waters should be gathered up in the seventh part of the earth: six parts hast thou dried up and kept them, to the intent that of these some being planted of God and tilled, might serve thee."

"Upon the fifth day thou saidst unto the seventh part where the waters were gathered, that it should bring forth living creatures, fowls and fishes: and so it came to pass."

These statements were reiterated in other verses, and were naturally considered as of controlling authority.

Among the scholars who pondered on this as on all other things likely to increase knowledge was Cardinal Pierre d'Ailly. This great man, while he denied the existence of the antipodes as St. Augustine had done, believed firmly in the sphericity of the earth, and, interpreting these statements of the book of Esdras in connection with this belief, he held that, as only one-seventh of the earth's surface was covered by water, the ocean between the west coast of Europe and the east coast of Asia could not be very wide. Knowing, as he thought, the extent of the land upon the globe, he felt that in view of this divinely authorized statement the globe must be much smaller, and the land of "Zipango," reached by Marco Polo, on the extreme coast of Asia, much nearer than had been generally believed.

On this point he laid stress in his great work, the Ymago Mundi, and an edition of it having been pubished in the days when Columbus was thinking most closely upon the problem of a westward voyage, it naturally exercised much influence upon his reasonings. Among the treasures of the library at Seville, there is nothing more interesting than a copy of this work annotated by Columbus himself; from this very copy it was that Columbus obtained confirmation of his belief that the passage across the ocean to Marco Polo's land of Zipango in Asia was short. But for this error, based upon a text supposed to be inspired, it is unlikely that Columbus would have had the courage to undertake his voyage. It is a curious fact that this single theological error thus promoted a series of voyages which completely destroyed not only this but every other conception of geography based upon the sacred writings.

MODERN MIRACLES.

CURING DISEASES WITHOUT MEDICINE IS NOW A STARTLING REALITY.

The way of curing diseases without medicine has been sought after for centuries, but it has remained for Prof. S. A. Weltmer, the great Nevada, Mo., scientist to discover this astounding secret. That he is performing the cures is abundantly substantiated by the many thousands he has so happily restored to perfect and permanent health. Many of his cures are little short of miracles. Mrs. M. E. Rea, the well known lodge woman of St. Louis, Mo., was a sufferer for many years with catarrh of the stomach and catarrhal gastritis. She tried the best medical talent in the land without any relief and her life hung in the balance. She was permanently cured in two days by Prof. Weltmer. Mrs. Julia Hughes, of 128 S. Main St., Nevada, Mo., had suffered from a multitude of ailments common to her sex; was reduced to a mere skeleton, could not walk and all hope of relief was gone. She was restored in a few days by this performer of modern miracles. Prof Weltmer also possesses the remarkable ability to cure at a distance and does this with the same ease as when the patient is in his presence at his infirmary. Thousands owe their present good health to this mighty influence. This is positively the only method that will fully restore lost vitality and kindred ailments. Send for a free copy of the Magnetic Journal, a 40-page illustrated magazine, giving a long list of the most marvelous cures on record. Prof. Weltmer also teaches the art of magnetic healing to others and it is the grandest profession of modern times. Address Prof S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., The American School of Magnetic Healing.

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discoun s kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

SOMNAMBULISM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IT is very difficult to distinguish between fact and fiction in narratives of what persons have done in their sleep. A propensity to get up and walk about while asleep is not at all an uncommon thing, especially with young persons, who commonly grow out of the predisposition for nocturnal activity. But many of the more serious cases of adult somnambulism have undoubtedly been of so striking a character, and had effects so startling and dramatic, while poets and playwrights, novelists and painters, have so mingled fiction with fact, that nobody can be quite sure how much of such accounts is true. If any reliance whatever may be placed on the narratives of those whose testimony certainly ought to be trustworthy, the most remarkable flights of fiction can scarcely have gone far beyond the range of simple fact. Macnish relates an instance of a somnambulist who left his house at twelve o'clock at night, walked through a difficult and dangerous road, and swam a mile and a half. He was discovered at two o'clock in the morning by Custom House officers who sent off a crew to pick him up, which they did, though he was then fast asleep, and could afterwards hardly be persuaded that he was not in bed. This seems a very extravagant story; but there is some reason for regarding it as by no means beyond the bounds of credibility. The records of the Old Bailey afford testimony to the fact that a brother of Lord Culpepper was acquitted of the murder of one of the Guards whom as well as his horse, he had done it when fast asleep. Stories of people who have composed songs and poetry or written essays during sleep are innumerable. A well authenticated case of mental exertion on the part of a somnambulist is that of Dr. Haycock, an Oxford professor of medicine, who was sometimes known to rise in his sleep and preach a vigorous and impressive sermon, which all the efforts of his friends could not prevent running its full length. A very singular instance of brain work during sleep was recorded in 1844. An inhabitant of the island of Syra, described as about eighteen years of age, tall and robust, soon after commencing a course of study, was frequently known to rise in his sleep and declaim passages from Xenophon, though quite incapable of doing so when awake. On one occasion he rose from his bed, wrote the theme required of him the next day, and then went to bed again and overslept himself. Vexed at thus finding himself behind with his work, he sat down to his task, but was overwhelmed with astonishment at finding his essay already written with his own hand, and folded already for his professor, to whom presently it was duly delivered. It proved to be of unusual merit, and led to a few questions on the subject, which, however, greatly embarrassed the student, who appeared to know very little about it, and would have got into serious trouble but for the testimony of a companion who declared that he had actually seen him rise in the night and write it. This same youth was fond of a game of cards when in a sleep-walking state, and invariably won—a fact attributed to his ability to see all the cards in his opponents hands. One very extraordinary assertion in connection with this case, which seems to have been well authenticated, was to the effect that the somnambulist one day announced that three persons whom he named were coming to see him. In the natural course of things he could have had no knowledge of their approach, but persons whom he named are said to have arrived within an hour. "You see," says the doctor, watching the sleep-walking Lady Macbeth, "her eyes are open."

"Ay," replies the waiting gentleman, "but their sense is shut." How far this is in accordance with fact is a moot point, and so is the question as to the possibility of sight by the somnambulist whose eyes are closed. Gall affirms that all experience goes to show that somnambulists who have their eyes shut hit themselves when objects unknown to them are placed in their way. But, on the other hand, Dr. Wienholt, a German physician of eminence and ability, mentions some very striking cases proving the contrary. He speaks of a rope-maker who, in a deep sleep and with his eyes fast closed, traveled repeatedly from Naremburg to Weimar, avoiding horses and carriages that came in his way, and on one occasion picking his way carefully over some logs of timber which had fallen across the road. On another occasion he rode on horseback through a river, allowing his horse to drink, and drawing up his feet so as to avoid wetting them. A great many facts, or alleged facts, have been recorded tending to show the possession of some intuitive perception in a great many sleepwalkers apart from the sense of eyesight.

We have not space here to discuss any of the theories that have been set up to explain this mysterious faculty, if, indeed, it really is ever known to exist, and, moreover, the mere fact of bodily activity while the senses are locked in sleep is in itself sufficiently mysterious for full consideration. At first sight it would seem quite incredible that a person should rise and—as in the case we alluded to at the outset—while fast asleep should plunge into the sea and swim for a mile and a half. But it is not more incredible than certain other facts of a kindred nature which are altogether beyond dispute.

"I remember," said Dr. Richardson, when taking the chair at a lecture at South Kensington, London, "Dr. Snow administering this curious substance—a kind of poison which under certain circumstances, may be generated in the body from the starchy parts of it—to a boy who was being operated upon by Sir William Ferguson. While Sir William Ferguson was amputating the foot—that was the operation—the boy was playing unconcernedly with a ball which he was throwing up and catching with the utmost precision." Dr. Richardson was discussing the relations between certain poisons and certain diseases. "Take somnambulism as an instance," he observed. "I have not the slightest doubt that somnambulism is produced by the formation in the body of a peculiar substance which may be derived from the starchy parts of the body, and has the effect of the chemical substance known as amylene. I believe that because I can produce artificial somnambulism by the use of that substance. Under its influence persons can be made to walk about unconsciously in the same way the somnambulist does. Afterwards, when the effect has gone off, the person becomes all right again; that is to say, when the effect of the poison—for to that extent it is a poison—passes away."

Then he goes on to speak of the boy who played with a ball while his foot was being amputated. If it is possible that the administration of a drug shall exert so strange an influence as that a boy, while sufficiently in possession of his senses to play with a ball, is yet so fast asleep as to be unaware that his foot is being taken off, it clearly becomes quite credible that he may take a swim in the water while too fast asleep to be awakened by the shock of the first plunge; and if it be assumed, as Dr. Richardson asserts it may be, this peculiar substance may be naturally generated in the body, then many of the phenomena of somnambulism not only become in a certain sense intelligible, but the problem of remedy would seem to be very much simplified. If, instead of some peculiarity of brain or nervous system generally, the care of somnambulism is merely the discovery of some simple antidote to a poison, the task is one which we may any day expect to be most effectually accomplished.

HA! HA! HA! FUN ALIVE!

The Comical Mirror.

A handsome convex mirror in a case suitable for carrying in the pocket. For many years the funniest and most laughable attraction in nearly every museum has been the large convex mirrors in which a person appears drawn out as long and narrow as a bean pole, or flattened down like a gridiron with a face as broad as a cellar door. This mirror produces the same effect as the large and expensive mirrors in the museums. By holding the mirror in an upright position stout people look thin and in a horizontal position thin people look stout; anyone can recognize themselves at once, but their features are so distorted and their general appearance so changed that they cannot fail to have a good laugh over it. If you have a friend (lady or gentleman) who think they are a little better looking than anyone else, let them take a peep into the mirror and it will take them down a peg or two—either the "short and fat" view or the "long and slim" view are stunners and will cure the blues every time. Send for one it will afford you lots of fun.

GRAND OFFER TO YOU. Send us 12 cents and we will send this splendid literary monthly for the Home, three whole months on a trial subscription and one Comical Mirror, postpaid; for 27 cents we will send you the paper 3 months and three mirrors all paid; or, for only 76 cents we will send the paper a whole year and one dozen mirrors by express. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

IN THE figure erected for the Lunation, or new moon, which occurs at about 12 minutes past 1 o'clock in the morning of April 10th, 1899, the great benefic Jupiter will be found almost exactly upon the South meridian. Capricorn will be rising and Saturn, the ruler of the Ascendant, will be just inside the 12th house in mundane sextile with his dispositor, and nearly in trine with the conjoined luminaries which are in the third house with Mercury. Mars is not favorably located, for he is in the 7th house receiving the square application of both the luminaries and Mercury. Venus is in the second house in benevolent aspect with Jupiter.

The figure promises well for the prosperity and general welfare of the country. The benevolent Jupiter, disposer of the ruler of the scheme, and of Venus, the lesser benefic, stands most elevated in the figure and will over-rule whatever opposing conditions threaten in the shape of disorder and enmities. Mars threatens dissensions and enmities if not actual bloodshed in the western and southwestern regions of our dominions, notably in connection with the government forces across the waters westward. It is apprehended some detriment may be suffered to the mail or telegraph service in the west. Cable cutting or seizure of mails or dispatches by disorderly elements is to be guarded against. Eruptive diseases and fevers in the western regions are likely to be particularly fatal, especially among children, and it is apprehended may prove disastrous to some one of our great men there, either in civil or military life. Some disaster upon our western waters, by which lives are lost, is probable during the last half of the month. Some unusual excitement in financial circles is indicated in the last days of April and persons much interested in speculative ventures, especially in the stock market of the country, should be watchfully alert or they will lose heavily by exciting fluctuations. Venus promises well for our National treasury from trade in agricultural products and indicates remunerative gains to the people from their crops as well as a good degree of fertility and bountiful yield from the soil.

The administration, despite political dissensions growing out of disputes over the policy of the Government, will have honor and support from our people as a whole and will be just and impartial for the Nation's welfare. Some one high in the postal service of the Government will be a serious sufferer under this lunation and probably in the early days thereof.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR APRIL, 1899.

APRIL 1—Saturday. A vein of evil is mixed with what would otherwise be very benevolent conditions on this day and somewhat embarrasses or frustrates the undertakings of the time; make no bargains for houses or lands; defer consultations with architects and builders and also all dealings of importance with persons in the dirty and laborious avocations, particularly during the latter half of the day.

2—Sunday. One of the best Sabbaths of the month; efforts of the clergy will be especially happy and effective, and minds dwell with earnestness and zeal on the contemplation of religious subjects: the day gives special enjoyment of the elegant in literature and art, and renders courtesies between the sexes particularly agreeable.

3—Monday. Choose not this day for beginning any important undertaking for no matter how favorable the promises they will prove delusive and result disastrously to them unless their nativity is remarkably good at this time; have no dealings in real estate, nor with landlords, contractors or farmers; the afternoon and evening are less evil than the morning hours. The day is unfortunate as a birthday anniversary and the time generally is decidedly adverse for persons born about the 13th of March, June, September, or December, of past years, as they are likely to be having very disappointing and baffling experiences in their affairs. Many of the male sex so born have business ruptures or serious disagreements, which threaten the success of their enterprises and render them despondent and quite unhappy. Ladies so born suffer more through the misfortunes of male relatives and friends and should be very discreet and careful in all their affairs; but especially so of their social engagements.

4—Tuesday. Avoid rashness of word and act and be not easily moved to wrath; the day is peculiarly dangerous for surgical operations especially if performed upon the head, stomach, or kidneys; the middle hours of the day are the best; more care than usual is urged in any of the speculative ventures, as they are likely to bring losses rather than gains, unless the nativity is remarkably good just at this time; don't sign any important agreement nor should travel be undertaken in the early hours of this day.

5—Wednesday. Begin the day early and urge all undertakings of a scientific, literary or artistic nature and press all general business to the utmost. Give preferences, if any, to the noon and afternoon hours for effecting major engagements with persons in the literary and intellectual callings when also urge all correspondence and literary matters; sign writings of all kinds except such as pertain to manufacturing interests, surgical or chemical work, or matters of construction; commercial transactions are well favored and dealings with banks and persons of wealth are assisted here. Attend also to writings affecting houses and lands and to printing and publishing.

6—Thursday. Begin this day with the sun and improve every moment; the merchant, tradesman, commercial traveler and all engaged in literary pursuits or having employment concerning books are particularly favored; authors will find the hours about noon of this day much more auspicious than usual for commencing any new and important work; make applications to officers of large corporations or government officials for favor or advancement.

7—Friday. The forenoon is the least favorable part of the day, and caution is suggested for avoidance of disputes through the morning hours; preference should be given to the noon and early afternoon hours for dealings with persons in the elegant avocations of life, musicians, artists, and dealers in fancy and artistic wares; the late hours of the day are depressing and more likely to give disappointments, either then or to the matters then begun.

8—Saturday. After the very early hours this day will be full of energy and enterprise and invites activity in all the walks of life, but especially for machinists, engineers, mechanics, travelers, surgeons, electricians, military men, cutlers and iron and brass workers; consult thy dentist and experiment in chemistry.

9—Sunday. This day is quite favorable for church matters and conduces in an unusual degree to religious fervor and moral advancement, and church contributions are likely to be very liberal.

10—Monday. Enter upon the active pursuit of business with the first moments of the day and waste no time in pleasure or folly; specially fortunate for the literary and scientific pursuits, the polite arts, important correspondence, employment of help, the execution of writings pertaining to houses and lands and concerning printing; unless care is had, the afternoon will bring annoyances through haste of judgment or disputes.

11—Tuesday. Hold on to the pennies; do not speculate, nor expect any favor from banks or other money institutions, especially in the forenoon; the afternoon favors the elegant and artistic pursuits and promises more than ordinary pleasure from the musical or dramatic entertainments.

12—Wednesday. Choose not the forenoon of this day for beginning any important undertaking; have no dealings in real estate, nor with landlords, contractors or farmers; the afternoon and evening invite activity in the mechanical callings and promote success from dealings in metals, machinery and cutlery, or with chemists, engineers, surveyors, tanners, bakers, carpenters and founders.

13—Thursday. Avoid this day for dealings with public officers or superintendents of great public works, also railway officials and large corporations; do not expect much pleasure from dramatic or musical entertainments in the evening.

14—Friday. Baffling circumstances attend the prosecution of business relating to fancy and ornamental goods, musical merchandise and also the pursuit of the fine arts; beware of making any matrimonial engagement in this forenoon; the forenoon hours are recommended for the literary pursuits and for dealings of minor character with persons engaged in clerical capacities, also teachers, students, surveyors, and civil engineers; when also mercantile business is to be urged to the utmost and the earlier in the afternoon the better for the success.

15—Saturday. The early and late hours are the best ones of the day; seek favor from thine employer and from persons in high stations in life; the latter half of the day is recommended for purchase of goods and for dealings with banks or persons of wealth and station.

16—Sunday. An unfavorable Sabbath day, in which it will be well to bridle the tongue and avoid contention; rest and quiet are best sought.

17—Monday. Seek no advantage from thine employer nor ask favors from public officials or persons in authority in great corporations; the evening is conducive to rashness, peevishness and excitability and a bridle should be placed upon the impulses; have care also in handling inflammables or explosives and see that no chances are taken of harm or loss from fire or violent accident.

18—Tuesday. Great circumspection is advised in thine undertakings of this day; look sharp if engaged in speculation, as some bad losses are threatened. In fact, the last half of April is likely to witness some unusual fluctuations in the money or stock market and some bad failures occur and fraud and defalcations of magnitude come to light. Don't purchase goods for trade on this day and hold on to the purse strings for avoidance of unnecessary or extravagant purchases.

19—Wednesday. Begin this day with the sun and urge all manner of business to the utmost. It is the merchant's own day and specially fortunate for all honorable pursuits; buy goods for trade, speculate in legitimate methods of business, travel, sign writings, urge literary and scientific pursuits and apply for favor or money accommodations during the forenoon; execute deeds, mortgages, leases, wills, and all species of contracts concerning building, particularly if thy nativity also favor such acts.

20—Thursday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday with the utmost vigor, giving preference, if any, to such matters as depend upon mental labor; the time is particularly favorable for literary matters and for the prosecution of mathematical and scientific studies; the mind is unusually active; urge correspondence, make contracts, especially those effecting legal and educational matters; hire help and push all matters of trade and business; effect important deals with banks and the wealthy.

21—Friday. Give preference to the middle hours of the day for the pursuit of all general business; the morning encourages transactions of minor character pertaining to the elegant and artistic pursuits, though it is not wise to begin great things of this nature at this time; the evening hours promote combustibility and all are cautioned to be guarded as to fires.

22—Saturday. Dramatists, musicians, artists, jewelers, upholsterers, and furniture dealers are just at this time "under the ban," experience losses or embarrassments and will need to exercise unusual caution in all their acts; it will be well for theatrical managers and artists if they defer for a short time entering into important professional engagements; let the fair sex shun matrimony for a season, but particularly during these last two days of the week, if their desire be for domestic peace or harmony in the marriage relation.

23—Sunday. Specially conducive to mental eccentricities and indulgencies in the imaginative and marvellous in literature. The time is full of excitement and anxiety to persons born about 23rd of January, April, July or October, of past years, and many of such persons are having annoying physical experiences, feverish complaints, or are in the midst of strife or contention in their business affairs; and not a few of them have met unusual losses from speculative ventures; all such persons will be wise to be guarded against loss from fires, explosions and accidents.

24—Monday. The week begins with an excellent day for the vigorous prosecution of general business. It is particularly recommended for transactions pertaining to houses and lands, mines, building, and dealings in wood, coal, lumber, petroleum, lead and all kinds of plumbing materials; use the forenoon for engagements with banks and attention to pecuniary matters.

25—Tuesday. Look to thy purse on this day; loan no money and gauge thine expenditures by thine actual needs. REGULUS cannot advise the beginning of any new and important enterprise, no matter how flattering the promise, for conditions are very unfavorable, indicating embarrassment and poor success if not ultimate loss. Such conditions likewise advise extreme caution in finances, discourage large purchases of merchandise for trade and are bad for the giving of business credits or loans of money; bad failures and heavy commercial losses are induced under the prevailing influences; see that special precautions are observed against fire for we are in the midst of conditions which threaten peculiar fury of the fire element, causing excessive property losses and sacrifice of human life. These features of events are particularly noticeable in the lives of persons born about the last days in January, April, July and October, of past years, and such persons are cautioned that the passing time calls for unusual care in the respects indicated, for best avoidance of mischief to their nativities. They should likewise be cautious about exposing themselves to harm from bad eruptive and inflammatory diseases.

26—Wednesday. Keep thy tongue under restraint during the better part of this day, nor be rash in decision in business matters; quarrels and contentions are easy of birth and more violence abounds at this time; have no dealings with persons in business concerned with fancy or artistic goods or with chemical or electrical materials or machinery.

27—Thursday. An excellent day for transactions with persons in the artistic pursuits, dealers in wearing apparel, clothing manufacturers, weavers, musicians, dramatists, dressmakers, tailors, embroiderers and workers in wax and artistic materials; don't be too hasty in decisions in trade nor in speculative transactions.

28—Friday. Improve every minute of the first two-thirds of this day, pushing all commercial transactions, entering into contracts pertaining to books and literary matters and dealing with printers, publishers, lawyers, and all ingenious persons.

29—Saturday. The morning and evening hours are the least auspicious of the day; don't have dealings with real estate men, furniture dealers, jewelers, decorators nor persons in the artistic pursuits.

30—Sunday. Not particularly promising for a Sabbath day, inviting rest and quiet rather than physical exertion or mental effort.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

No diplomatic position in the gift of our great Republic is more coveted than the post of Ambassador to England. There is a social as well as diplomatic distinction in being accredited to the Court of St. James. We require more than mere statesmanship, more than mere wealth, more than mere literary culture in the man who stands between the two great English speaking branches of the Anglo Saxon race. On January the twelfth this great honor was conferred for the second time in the administration of President McKinley. Joseph Hodges Choate of New York was named by the Senate to succeed Colonel Hay as Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain. Mr. Choate is one of the best known lawyers in the United States. He comes of staunch old Puritan stock, his ancestor John Choate having come to New England in 1640. Mr. Choate was born in the old witch-haunted town of Salem, Mass., in 1832. He was born on the twenty-fourth of January so this last great honor comes almost as a birthday gift. Joseph Choate is a son of Harvard, being graduated from that University at the age of twenty. Three years after his graduation he was admitted to the bar. In 1856 he located in New York, and three years later became a law partner in the well-known firm of Evarts, Choate and Beaman. As a lawyer he has become famous for the versatility of his knowledge. He has great ability as a public speaker and a national reputation as a wit. His kindly genial face is well known in the great metropolis. He has the qualities of good fellowship and of delicate tact required in an Ambassador to England. The American people feel no doubt that his popularity on the other side of the water will rank with that of his famous predecessors.

Mrs. Frances Hodgdon Burnett or Mrs. Hodgdon as she now has the legal right to call herself is undoubtedly the most successful woman writer of the day. Any one of the phenomenal successes she has won would place her in the first rank. To be the author of Little Lord Fauntleroy is fame enough for one person, but it is only one success among many won by this versatile and talented woman. Frances Hodgdon was born in the great manufacturing city of Manchester, England, and it was here that she became familiar with the odd Lancashire dialect that she used in some of her earlier tories, notably in That Lass O'Lowries. Her father died when she was about four years old but the family were in easy circumstances and until Frances Hodgdon was fourteen years of age she lived the average life of the average well-to-do English girl. Reverses, however, came; little by little the family fortune was reduced until finally no alternative was left except to seek a new home in America where Mrs. Hodgdon's brother believed an opening could be found for the boys. The family came to Newmarket, Tennessee, but the family fortune continued to ebb. At last it was not a question of giving up luxuries but a question of the actual lack of necessities. In this strait, Frances determined to aid the family finances and opened a private day school in one room of the log house that was "home" to the family. Money was scarce and the young schoolmistress was obliged to take her tuition fees in carrots, potatoes, etc. The next move was to Knoxville into a tiny house which the merry-hearted family dubbed "Noah's Ark." There were three girls and they faced the real privations of life with a light-hearted girlish glee that robbed poverty of half its sting. The three had each to contribute to the wardrobe of the fortunate one who had any merry-making on hand and the various articles were in this way common property. By no chance could two of the girls be in gala attire at the same time and the woman who to-day is remarked for her magnificent gowns had a one-third interest in the one presentable outfit of the girls from Noah's Ark. But the "little person" as she calls herself in her story of her life was not disheartened. She would write, and write she did after selling wild grapes to pay for postage and paper. The rest reads like a fairy tale, for the stories brought fame and wealth. Instead of Noah's Ark, Mrs. Hodgdon to-day has one home in London and another in Washington; both of them filled with rare furniture, objects of art, bric-a-brac and all the luxurious, artistic litter of modern taste. Peterson's Magazine published her first story. Her success was instantaneous and continued. She made a brief visit to England and upon her return married Dr. Burnett, an oculist of Washington, D. C. This relation has been recently severed by mutual agreement and Mrs. Burnett resumes her maiden name. Two sons were born, Lionel and Vivian. The deepest sorrow of Mrs. Hodgdon's life was the death of her eldest son in Paris in 1885. The cross that marks his grave bears the words, "Lionel, Whom the gods loved." Vivian graduated in June at Harvard, where he made a place for himself by his talent and genial ways. One of the events in the dramatic world was the great success of the play "A Lady of Quality" which was dramatized from Mrs. Hodgdon's novel. Her latest book "The Duke of Osmonde" gives the man's point of view of the same story. Mrs. Hodgdon's workshop at the top of her Washington home is the most interesting part of that beautiful house. It is thoroughly comfortable with its broad couches, pictures, photographs and books. The revolving bookcase that stands by her desk is filled at present with histories, and special books treating of the period in which the action of her last two novels occurs. Mrs. Hodgdon does not make hard work of her writing. She has the story all developed before she does any writing. Then her first copy is sent to the publishers. She is thoroughly progressive and seems to have the talent of discerning the public taste and of supplying its demands. No dialect story was more popular than That Lass O'Lowries, no child's story ever made a greater sensation than Little Lord Fauntleroy, and no daring advocate of the right of the "unquiet sex" ever created a more dashing figure than Clorinda in "A Lady of Quality."

One of the most picturesque features of Washington life is the presence on the streets of members of the foreign legations in the brilliant dress of their nation. Of course the Oriental nations add most color to the scene and chief among the observed is the new minister from Siam, Phya Visddha Suriyasakti. Phya means "baron," or a member of the lesser nobility of Siam. The new Siamese minister is finely educated, with a keenly inquiring turn of mind. He is much interested in schools and particularly in manual training. He has visited Hampton and the Indian school in Carlyle. The early part of the winter he spent in travel about this country, returning to Washington in time for the opening of Congress in December. After a brief taste of the social life of Washington he will pay a visit to London.

Richard Mansfield occupies a unique position on the American stage. His great genius is now universally acknowledged. He is an artist who is content with nothing less than the most finished interpretation of his art. He has long been noted for a savage indifference to the applause of the public or the decisions of dramatic critics. His speeches before the curtain are often devoted to scolding his audiences or criticising the press. Mansfield is English by birth but has become thoroughly identified with the American stage. He has the indifference to gain of the true artist. His great success, "Dr. Jekyl and Mr. Hyde," would have filled the theater for an indefinite time but Mansfield utterly refuses to become identified with any one part. He is an actor of great versatility but of marked mannerisms. His Beau Brummel gave a picture of the most exquisite dandyism while his Baron Chevrial showed the wicked old roue. His latest success, Cyrano de Bergerac, has revolutionized opinion as to the manner and method of a successful play. That a romantic poem, a love story in blank verse could crowd the theaters from one end of the country to the other proved a surprise to many knowing ones. Mansfield took a play that most dramatic critics would declare entirely unsuited to the times, and made the greatest artistic and financial success of it. Richard Mansfield has been called the Irving of America, and his great effort to make the drama an elevating art certainly deserves that recognition.

Sven Hedin, the young Swedish explorer, is as well known in Europe as his countryman Dr. Nansen. America is just becoming interested in Hedin's valuable contributions to scientific and geographical knowledge. The young Swede is but thirty-three years of age, but he has made three long and eventful journeys through Central Asia and endured enough hardships to fill an ordinary lifetime. He proposed to be an Arctic explorer. Before he was seventeen, he had filled book after book with the most carefully drawn and beautifully executed maps. He left his studies at Upsala to tutor for a year. During this year he spent much time in studying the dialect of Turkey and the Persian language. He received $160 for his year's work and with this sum he made a journey through Persia. His observations were recorded in a book entitled, "Through Persia, Mesopotamia and the Caucasus." In 1892, he finished his studies at the University, taking the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. The same year he was appointed as a member of an embassy sent from Sweden to the Shah of Persia. Dr. Hedin's knowledge of Persian made his services of especial value. On the conclusion of this duty, he prepared for his great expedition across Central Asia from west to east, to study the glaciers, to explore the Thibetan plateau and to settle a dispute concerning the location of a lake. The money for the expedition was subscribed by the King of Sweden, a Russian and many prominent Swedes. The expedition occupied three years and seven months. The time was filled with exciting adventures, almost super-human traits of endurance and frightful hardships. At one time the intrepid explorer staggered alone across a desert, scorching by day, freezing by night, ten days without food and nine days without water. A third expedition was undertaken with the object of searching for old buried towns in the desert. He found many relics of these lost villages and many old manuscripts that had been buried in the shifting desert sand for unknown years. He satisfied himself that those buried towns had once been inhabited by Buddhists, although that faith has long since died. At no distant date the world will hear more of the work of Dr. Sven Hedin in the cradle of the world's history.

Mrs. Zelia Nuttall is a recognized authority on the language, antiquities and picture writings of ancient Mexico. She is honorary special assistant in the Peabody Museum of American Archæology and Ethnology. She was born in San Francisco and is of Irish-Spanish-American descent. She says her blood is half American but her heart is wholly so. She studied in Paris, Germany, London and Italy. She has traveled much and is an expert linguist. At the American Congress at Huelva, Spain, much attention was attracted by Mrs. Nuttall's tables with her reconstruction of the ancient calendar system of Mexico. These were afterwards shown at an historical exhibition at Madrid and at the World's Fair in Chicago. Here, Mrs. Nuttall by reason of her special and exhaustive knowledge of the subject was judge of the Mexican and Central American archæology in the department of anthropology. In 1896, the University of Pennsylvania sent Mrs. Nuttall to Russia to collect archæological and ethnological material for its museum. At the tenth International Congress of Americans held in Stockholm in 1894, Mrs. Nuttall read a paper before King Oscar II. on "A Preliminary Note on the Ancient Mexican Calendar System." Mrs. Nuttall illustrates her Mexican researches by drawings made from the original objects. She is an acknowledged authority on the ancient picture writings of Mexico. She has discovered a very valuable anonymous Hispano-Mexican document. The original is preserved in the Biblioteca Nazional Centrale at Florence, Italy. She has published it in fac-simile with a translation, notes and commentary under the title of "The Life of the Indians." It gives much information that is new and valuable. Mrs. Nuttall is a Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and has been honored by membership in the leading scientific societies in the United States and Europe.

THE MYSTERY OF THE CLOSED ROOM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MARY ALLERSLEE DOYLE.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

I HAD dropped in at the rooms, 223 B Baker St., to find my friend Holmes absent, and his things in the confusion that follows a hasty departure. I threw his pajamas and nightcap back into his bedroom and shut the door on the disorder within, took a peep into what had been my own bedroom, but which he now used for his chemical experimentation, and then pushed the chairs into place and cleared a space in the middle of the sitting-room, preparatory to enjoying a quiet smoke.

From where I sat I could see through one of the windows down into the street, and just as I cut the end off my cigar, noting at the same time that it was the last I had with me, my glance fell upon a man running in a diagonal direction from around the next corner toward 223 B. A few seconds later there was a sound of footsteps on the stairs and the landlady ushered this same man into the room.

He paused for a moment to regain his breath. I motioned him into the chair opposite. "Are you—Mr.—Sheridan Holmes?" he gasped, trembling from what might have been utter exhaustion or fright. At the same time he felt into a cheap cigarcase in an upper vest pocket, but his fingers came away empty.

"Mr. Holmes is out," I answered, "but will, I think, be in directly. I am Dr. Watson—Dr. John Watson." I offered him the cigar that I was just preparing to smoke. He seized it, struck a match, inhaled several deep whiffs, and uttered a sigh of relief.

"That's better. I am an inveterate smoker and nothing but tobacco will brace my nerves. They need bracing now!" Then he fell to puffing again.

I rose from my chair and walked over to the mantelpiece to get Holmes' pipe.

"I am in a terrible fix," he said, leaning towards me.

"What is the trouble?"

"Murder!"

"You have murdered some one?"

"No, but I am in instant danger of being accused of doing so. Oh! I wish Sheridan Holmes were here. It's my room-mate. Last night we were out late and finally had a quarrel. I wouldn't go home with him. This afternoon I went around to the room—we live in Axminster Court—and I found the place in charge of the police. My partner had been murdered in his bed!"

The fellow had smoked his cigar down till it burnt his lips. He threw the stump at the cuspidor and missed it, and then began to fidget.

"When is that detective coming?" he groaned.

I started to repeat my assurances, when he jumped up, seized his hat, and with an "I'll come back again," flung out of the room.

I sat still watching his retreating figure through the window, and pulled at the pipe. Another minute and Holmes hove in sight, his tall figure and loping gait making it easy to recognize him in the crowd. A half minute later he was bounding up the stairs and into the room, but not before I had slipped the empty pipe back on the mantel where I found it, and resumed my place at the window.

"Hello! You, Watson? I am glad to see you. Who was the other?"

"What other?"

"Your visitor."

"Now, really——"

"Oh, come! A man was sitting here talking to you within the last three minutes."

"Well," I said, undone by his assurance, "I admit it. But first tell me how you know, and then I will tell you about him. It is important, too."

"Very simple, and quite plain. The room smells of tobacco."

"I was smoking your pipe."

"But my pipe tobacco makes a grey smoke. That blue cloud up there is from a cigar. The smell, however is of my tobacco, showing that both were smoking at once. There is the cigar, and the dash of ashes where it fell shows that it was not thrown from your chair but from the other. All the spit marks on the cuspidor come from your direction, showing that the man in this chair, who smoked the cigar, had a habit of swallowing his saliva. The evidence is complete. Now about the visitor. Is it a case?"

"Yes. You met him just at the corner. Tall, slightly crosseyed, a straw hat with a blue band."

"I noticed him. A collector, I should judge. By the way, I have a rather preplexing case on hand now. You will be interested. I slept late to-day and was aroused about noon by a summons from Gregson. There has been a murder or something over in Smithfield, in a place called Axminster Court."

"My visitor came to see you about that."

"Ah, he must be the room-mate of the—corpse. So he came to engage me, did he? What particulars did he give you?"

"Well, really none, I think. He was very nervous, and I found that he is a nicotine fiend."

"Pshaw! Well, he will come back. I haven't had anything to eat to-day. You will join me in a bite." He rang the bell and presently the landlady brought in a dinner that she had been trying to keep warm. I helped myself sparingly and Holmes began to feed himself, talking between mouthfuls.

"This problem is likely very simple, but it baffles me more completely so far than anything I have had of late. The second floor of the Axminster Court tenement house contains a long narrow hall which opens into the various rooms. This hall is reached from the ground by two stairways, one at the back and one at the front. At the head of one of these stairways is a room occupied by a cobbler, an old ex-soldier, with a wooden leg. Next to this room is another, which has been used as a lodging by a young man named Peter Nobb, a collector and solicitor for a laundering company, and one Charlemagne Beauregard, a man of fifty years, and whose principal occupation, at least since coming to that neighborhood, has been to keep drunk on a small income. This morning Beauregard was seen about the place in his usual unsteady condition until about ten o'clock, when he went into his room and bolted the door on the inside. An hour later, Constable Hace broke into the room and found the man dead in bed with a round depression in his skull where he had been struck by the round head of a shoemaker's hammer.

"The case, as I said, is very remarkable. There are plenty of data. These are of such a character as to admit of the most satisfactory analysis. But the result is anything but satisfactory. The conclusion I reach from a full review of the evidence is that the man cannot be, and, therefore, is not, dead. But this conclusion certainly does not agree with the facts, for they have the body at the morgue.

"Here are the details in brief. Gregson came at noon and wanted me to take a look into the case. We went and found the place as I have said. Constable Hace's evidence was to the effect that he had looked through a crack in the door and had seen the dead man on the bed. He had put his shoulder against the door and burst it open. Had made sure that the man was dead, and had hurried to keep out the crowd of tenants, who were attracted by the breaking door. He had then reported to headquarters. Gregson had been detailed, and had called in Lestrade. When they were baffled they came for me.

"I found the room just as it was when Hace first broke in, except that the body was gone. I made a preliminary examination of the surroundings. The only furniture was a double bed, two chairs and a washstand. There was one window, and two doors. One of these opened into the hall; the other, into the shoemaker's room. Now to try a little analysis.

"The man was dead. The cause of his death, apparently, was a blow from a hammer which lay on the floor, and which, I have since ascertained, fits the depression in the skull to a nicety. How was this blow caused? Analysis means to divide or split up. There is more than one basis of division; we will consider the possibilities of (1) human agency (2), agency other than human. If human agency, we might divide into intent or accident; but this division will help us none. Let us say rather (a) was the hammer held by a human, or (b) was it thrown or projected through space? Then, still further, was it the victim himself who wielded the hammer, or was it some other human?

"Now let us consider an agency other than human, first as wielding the hammer by actual contact, and second by throwing or projecting it through space.

"Before carrying the analysis any further I will speak of the examination of the surroundings I made, and then consider the questions this analysis brings out, in the light of that examination. The window was locked, and so covered by dust and spider webs as to show beyond a peradventure that nothing had passed through it in months. An examination of the hall door showed that as the constable had thought, the door was bolted on the inside, and his rush against it had torn the staple from the woodwork. The door leading into the shoemaker's room was not bolted on either side but was locked, and the key no one could place. Moreover, the shoemaker's bench was placed across this doorway and he had been sitting there all that morning. The crack in the hall door, mentioned by Constable Hace, was too narrow to admit the passage of the hammer. The ceiling, walls and floor of the room I inspected thoroughly, and am sure that there is not an opening of any kind bigger than a small rat hole.

"Now to review the questions. Was the blow struck by the victim himself, and if so, did he hold the hammer in his hand, or throw it? I am satisfied that the wound is in such a place and of such a character that this possibility may be dismissed. Next, was some other human the immediate cause of the blow from the hammer, and if so, was it held, or was it projected through space? Only by one route could the murderer have had ingress to the room to strike a direct blow or to throw the weapon; that is, by the door across which the shoemaker's bench stood. Under this head, however, there is still another possibility. Suppose that the hammer was already in the room, before the hall door was bolted shut. It could not have been wielded on the end of a pole, for the only opening, the crack in the door, would not allow of it. But it might have been tripped by a string from a height. There was a shelf high up above the bed and I was sure I had solved the mystery; but on examination it proved to becovered with a quantity of dust that showed no sign of having been disturbed.

"As for an agency other than human, which either held or projected the hammer: It could not have been shot into the room, we have already decided. An ape could not have brought it in any more readily than a man. A rat might have tipped it off the shelf, but you can't get around the dust.

"Now we have viewed all the possibilities, and the only explanation we have is the suspicion aroused against the old shoemaker. After we had talked it all over, Gregson was so convinced of my reasoning, that he arrested the cobbler at once. To make the case stronger, the hammer with which Beauregard was killed was found to be the mate of another in the shoemaker's kit, and he acknowledged that it was his.

"But now I have a host of little witnesses whose evidence proves the old man's innocence. It seems that he makes friends with all the children in the Court, and they play in his shop. Just after breakfast, they say, they slyly tied his wooden leg to his bench, and some of them hung around all the morning to enjoy the joke when he should try to get up. Gregson admits he found him thus tied when he arrested him.

"To corroborate this evidence, I have taken out the lock of that door and found that the dusty tumblers of the lock had not been thrown for weeks, at least. Thus you see, the conclusion drawn from the most rigid deductions is that the man could not be, and is not, killed. Is it any wonder I am puzzled?"

Just at this point the landlady ushered in my visitor, Peter Nobb, the room-mate of the murdered man. And almost before he had taken the proffered seat, puffing at one of a new supply of cheap cigars, the door burst open again and in pranced Lestrade. He shook a pair of handcuffs in Nobb's face and "hissed" in the most approved penny dreadful style:

"I arrest you in the Queen's name for the murder of your dearest friend, Charlemagne Beauregard!"

The poor fellow nearly fainted. Then he began to beg Holmes to save him. Sheridan had got his pipe and was preparing for a big smoke himself. "Caught the right man, Lestrade? What is your evidence?"

"They had a very violent quarrel last night."

"Pooh!"

"Well, that isn't evidence, but it's strong probability."

"Pish!"

"Well, if you know so much, name the man you suspect. Gregson says you're stumped."

Holmes was pulling furiously at his pipe. Suddenly he struck his forehead. "I have it!" he shouted. Then he looked oddly at Lestrade. "I think (puff) when the truth (puff) comes out you and Greg (puff) son will be (puff, puff) the two worst sold men in the service. I'm going to (puff) "make an arrest myself," and he jumped up and put on his hat. As he opened the door, in walked Gregson. He looked sick.

"Hello!" said Holmes. "How's your man?"

"I let him go," answered Gregson, shortly. He looked at Lestrade and the bracelets on Nobb's wrists. "Better let him go, too." He handed a sheet of paper to Holmes, who had stepped back into the room. It was a note addressed to the superintendent of division.

"Last winter," Holmes read, "a man who is now known to the public as Charlemagne Beauregard killed my brother. The circumstances were such as to make his conviction before a court impossible. I decided to take the law into my own hands. The murderer had taken a name then unknown to me and lost himself in the East Side. In order to facilitate my search, and to support myself while it lasted, as well as to ensure my escape from suspicion, I secured a position on the police force." Holmes stopped to chuckle. "This morning when I had located the murderer I boldly broke in his door, executed him with one blow of a hammer, and then reported the mysterious murder to headquarters, as you would have expected from your humble servant,

JOHN HACE, Constable."

"The analysis was all right," said Holmes, as he unlocked the handcuffs from Nobb's wrists, "but I didn't carry it back far enough at first. Didn't I say that you official detectives would be sold, when the truth came out?"

A RARE INSTANCE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY R. B. HILL.

"REMEMBER, young gentlemen, the instances in which you will really be called upon to disregard your professional obligations are so rare as to be scarcely worth mentioning. It is poor policy to sacrifice principle to expediency. It doesn't pay—in the truest sense of the words—in the long run. I sincerely wish you all honorable and prosperous careers."

With these closing remarks the Dean of —— Dental College bowed to the members of the graduating class, and stepped from the rostrum into the faculty room.

"I tell you, boys," said one of the students, as they left the lecture-hall, "that kind of talk sounds well from behind the footlights, but the difference between theory and practice is about as great as that between giving advice and taking it. A man in our profession or any other may be able to preserve his 'professional honor' pretty well after he has established a good practice and has a respectable bank account, but when a poor devil is struggling to get a foothold the professional slips he makes are not as few and far between as angels' visits. Necessitas non habet legem. What say you, Drayton?"

The handsome face of the young man thus addressed lighted up with resolve as he replied:

"I fear there is much truth in what you say, Ponder; but I for one propose not to lose sight of the ethics of my chosen profession. I will have to get very hungry before I stoop to non-ethical practices."

"Nevertheless, my boy, you'll 'stoop'," said the first speaker, laughing, "and you'll be something less than a century older than you are now when you do it, too; though I do believe you will do as little of it as any member of the class."

Calvin Drayton—called by his classmates "Earnest Calvin"—meant what he said, and it is his most remarkable departure from his determination that we have to chronicle. After receiving his sheepskin he opened an office in a flourishing town of several thousand inhabitants, and from the beginning did well, owing to conscientious, skillful work and genial manners. Had he remained at G—— he would doubtless in the course of a few years have become one of its most prosperous and honored citizens; but that came into his life which must come to us all sooner or later—he loved. But when he proposed he was rejected, and being sore hurt left his native land for a foreign country. The fair object of his love told him gently, with tears in her eyes, that she was so sorry but that already she was pledged to another, who himself had, several years before, gone far away to seek his fortune.

Sad and sick at heart Calvin turned his back on all he held dear and became a "stranger in a strange land among strange people." He opened his office in a rough but growing town in the diamond region of South Africa, and after the first week had more work than he could do, and at prices he never dreamed of receiving; but everything was proportionately high. He had been in Diamondton about two months when one day, while he was in the midst of an operation two men walked in; one, a white man, who introduced himself as Hogan, and the other, a gorgeously-bedizened African, whom Hogan introduced as "The great Chief Wombesa, a remarkable man and one of the richest natives in Africa. He has seen some of your work," continued the man, "and he wants you to put some gold fillings in his front teeth."

"I'm not in the habit of working for negroes at home," said Drayton, "but I suppose things are different here."

"Well, rather," Hogan answered. "In this instance the condescension is on his part and the privilege on yours. Besides, if the work pleases him, he will probably give you a diamond worth several hundred dollars in payment."

"If he needs the work I will do it for him, and will accept the diamond, too, if offered, partly as an evidence that I do not agree with you as to our relative positions," said Drayton. "But speaking of diamonds," he continued, "what has this heathen to do with diamonds?"

"Oh, nothing," the Irishman replied, "except that he owns a diamond field. See that necklace of rough stones he's wearing? He has been offered one hundred thousand dollars for that several times; and he'll be swindled if he ever takes three times that amount for it."

Having finished his operation Drayton examined the mouth of the African chief, and somewhat to his surprise found his teeth almost perfect from wisdom teeth to central incisors. Turning to Hogan he told him there was not a speck of decay to be seen.

"I know that," rejoined the individual addressed. "Just go ahead and bore three or four holes in his upper front teeth—the larger the better—and fill them with gold."

Thereupon Drayton informed Hogan that he would not bore into a sound tooth, even in the mouth of a savage, in order to insert a filling, not for the value of more than one diamond. Hogan protested earnestly against this decision, telling Drayton it was not only as much as his place—that of interpreter to the chief—was worth, but that his very life would be in danger, as Wombesa had set his heart on having the work done, and expected his persuasive powers to prevail under any circumstances. Finding the dentist inexorable, Hogan seemed in despair until an idea flashed into his mind.

"What were you doing in that man's mouth just now?" he asked. "You appeared to be sticking in a tooth somehow that had a filling in it already."

"So I was," Drayton answered. "The man had lost one of his teeth by a blow, and he came to me to see what I could do for him. As the root of the tooth was sound I removed the nerve, cleaned out the nerve-canal, and inserted what is commonly called a 'pivot tooth,' first, at the special request of the patient, placing gold filling in it."

"O, I see!" exclaimed Hogan; and turning to Wombesa he spoke to him in that worthy's jibberish. For a few moments the chief's eyes gleamed fiercely and he looked at Drayton like a tiger about to spring; but as the white man continued to talk the African's face relaxed, and uttering two or three gutteral grunts he pointed to his mouth, and then strode from the room.

"Be back in a few minutes," said Hogan to Drayton as he followed Wombesa. "Keep your chair vacant."

In less than fifteen minutes they returned, and as the chief entered the office he pointed again to his mouth, and his lips being drawn back from his white teeth in a broad grin, Drayton saw with amazement and disgust that his superior central incisors were gone.

"He made me knock 'em out, or rather in, with a hammer," said Hogan, in answer to a look of inquiry from Drayton. "Put two of those pivot-teeth in now, with big gold fillings in them, and if I'm not mistaken it will be the best day's work you have ever done in this business."

And so it proved, for when the work was complete and the savage beheld the shining gold fillings reflected in a mirror he seemed carried away with delight, pointing first at his teeth, a broad grin on his face the while, and then at the huge earrings and diamond necklace, with a deprecatory shake of his head, as much as to say, "I prefer this." Then he took from a dirty little leather wallet hung from his belt an uncut diamond and handed it to Drayton.

"Worth at least $300," Hogan said, as he glanced at it.

Suddenly Wombesa turned to Hogan and spoke rapidly. When he paused the Irishman said to Drayton:

"He says he wants you to go home with him and fill the teeth of his wives and children and some of his tribe with gold; that he has more diamonds waiting for you when you get through. It would be a diamond mine for you; and you would come back in a month or so—if nothing happened to prevent—a comparatively rich man."

"You wouldn't advise me to go then?"

"If I were in your place I would be sorely tempted to do so, in spite of the fact that more than one 'buckra' has gone into his section of the country and never been heard of since. However, if he continues pleased with your work, and did not give you so many diamonds in payment as to desire before you get away to re-possess himself of them, you might return in safety."

He went. And, as a week later, he stood face to face with Thompson Adler, who was Olive Wright's lover, he believed he knew what the impelling force had been. As this sun-tanned, hollow-eyed man told him of all he had endured for the last two years, since being made a prisoner in the African village, he felt that he was bound by the ties of common brotherhood to attempt his rescue, even if he had not promised the woman they both loved to try and find him and send him back to her. Alder told him of his adventures since arriving in Africa, which, in few words were as follows: He had landed at Diamondton about three years before with nothing. By hard work and close economy he had at the end of the first year laid aside some hundreds of dollars. These hard-earned dollars he had invested in those things dear to the African heart and started out on a trading expedition. Reaching Wombesa's village he bought some skins, and other things of the kind. Chancing one day to look at some colored pebbles with which a child was playing he noticed what looked like several rough diamonds among them. He was a jeweler by trade, and closer inspection convinced him that these were genuine stones.

"And right there my troubles began," said Adler bitterly. "Instead of pocketing the stones and saying nothing about it, I carried them to old Wombesa and offered to buy them. He went wild at once, took the stones from me, and said if I did not find others he would kill me. Neither he nor his people had dreamed that there were diamonds in their midst, and although they had no idea of their real value they knew they were precious. I was carried to the place where the said stones had been picked up, and with threats of death compelled to find others. Once I tried to escape, taking with me a few fine stones, which I had managed to conceal in spite of all their watching. I was caught, the diamonds recovered, and I was beaten into insensibility. When I recovered they put me to hunting diamonds again, and gave me to understand that the next time I would suffer death. That was long ago. More than once of late, after having been thoroughly searched, they have hinted that I might go if I wished, as several of the tribe now know a diamond when they see it pretty nearly as well as I do. But I have succeeded, at very great risk, in concealing eight fine stones, and I cannot leave without them. Help me—think of some way," he said, appealing to Drayton, "and you may select any two of the eight you wish."

Drayton racked his brain for a few minutes, and then said, half jestingly, "I will tell you how you can conceal four of them if they are small enough."

"How?" asked the other, almost springing from the operating chair where he had been since Drayton had completed the last filling in his mouth. "Quick, man!" he exclaimed excitedly.

"Suppose I remove the four fillings I have placed in your molar teeth; could you get the diamonds into the empty cavities?"

"Take out one of them—the largest—and let me see. Hurry, for the love of Heaven!"

"Not large enough by nearly half!" he groaned, as he saw the reflection of the cavity in a mirror; "but can't you make that fully twice as large by removing the interior of the tooth, and so with others?"

"Of course I could, but only by sacrificing sound tooth structure, and that would not be legitimate dentistry."

"Not 'legitimate dentistry'! Fellow are you crazy, or would you make me so?" and he glared at Drayton like a wild beast. For a moment he stood thus, and then sinking back into the chair said, in a voice painful in its forced calmness, "Now you can either prove the sincerity of your love by making the largest possible space in eight of my back teeth, or else you can prove yourself a sham and a fraud by not doing it; for I solemnly swear that I will not leave here without those diamonds, and I feel that this is my only chance!"

It was asking much of Drayton, the loss of his sweetheart, for he found that hope still lived, and an infraction of the code of ethics; but he rose to the occasion, solacing himself somewhat with the thought that it was one of those "rare instances" of which old Dean Bateman spoke.

The natives did not think to look beneath the thin cap of gold which Drayton fitted into each cavity where the diamonds were secreted, and in due time the white men were allowed to depart in peace.

THE PARTING OF JOSEPHINE AND NAPOLEON.

Love Strove with Ambition, But in Vain.

The tragedies of life are played for the most part in private. The closet which holds the private skeleton is always locked. Men and women smile on friends and guests and so hide the heartache and bitterness, which they would not have the world know of. But once in a while some typical tragedy is enacted on a high platform for all the world to gaze at. For the actors there is no privacy, no secrecy. They live in the glare of "that white light which beats upon the throne," and all their actions must be "naked and open" to the public eye.

It was so in the case of Josephine and Napoleon Bonaparte.

They were childless. The Emperor desired to found a dynasty. He wished to perpetuate a race of Emperors. The future of the Empire, his boundless ambition, the advice of counselors, all pushed him on to that final step,—divorce.

Love protested, but in vain.

That parting scene between the woman Josephine and the man Napoleon is historic.

"Low on the border of her couch they sat,
Stammering and staring. It was their last hour.
A madness of farewells."

For all time these two may stand as types of the unhappiness of the married who are childless.

"THE HEART KNOWETH ITS OWN BITTERNESS."

Behind closed doors in a hundred homes, the tragedy of childless marriage is being enacted. In most cases love forbids the breaking of the marriage bond. But the wife gazes hungry-eyed from her window, on the children romping in the street. And the husband coming from his office, pats some curly headed newsboy on the head, while the boy wonders why he got a dime instead of a penny for his paper. But each buries the secret longing in the heart. Each locks the skeleton away in the closet, where no prying eye may intrude upon it.

"God pity them both
And pity us all
Who vainly the dreams of youth recall."

Was the dream of youth vain?

Must the intense mother-longing of woman go unsatisfied?

Is there no word of hope or help for childless womanhood in this age of scientific miracles?

We can only reason from what we know. We know that women craving children have tasted the joy of motherhood, when they had given up all hope of this happiness.

"I had been a sufferer from uterine trouble for about three years, having two miscarriages in that time and the doctors that I consulted said I would have to go through an operation before I could give birth to children," writes Mrs. Blanche E. Evans, of Parsons, Luzerne Co., Pa., Box 41. "When about to give up in despair I saw the advertisement of Dr. Pierce's medicine and thought I would give it a trial as a last resort. I bought a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and after taking it felt better than I had for years. Felt improved before I had taken one-half of the bottle. After taking four and a half bottles I gave birth to a bright baby girl who is now four months old and has not had a day of sickness. She is as bright as can be. I cannot say too much in praise of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription."

SINGULAR BUT NOT SOLITARY.

The case of Mrs. Evans may be singular but it is not solitary. This is only one case out of many in which Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has proved the "one thing needful."

"For five years my wife was in an almost helpless condition, suffering from female weakness," writes J. S. Everitt, Esq., of Hagerman, Washington Co., Fla. "Last September I decided to try Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. She took several bottles of the medicine and gave birth to a ten pound son on January 31st, 1898. She is now sound and well and doing housework."

These cases are less wonderful than they seem. There is no magic or miracle about the results achieved by the use of "Favorite Prescription." Motherhood is the natural privilege of women. When this privilege is denied it is often because of local diseases which stand in Nature's way. Cure these diseases and the obstruction is removed. The orderly processes of Nature are carried out on creation's original plan. The one thing "Favorite Prescription" does is to put the woman in harmony with Nature. It regulates the periods, dries up the debilitating drains, cures inflammation, ulceration and displacement. It puts the delicate organs of motherhood in a condition of perfect health. Nature does the rest.

The way for motherhood is prepared by "Favorite Prescription," but more than this the way is cleared of all the stumbling stones of doubt and dread on which so many women fall. The time spent in preparing the tiny wardrobe is a time of happy anticipation. There is no depression, no nervousness. And when the hour of trial comes, it is so brief, and the baby's advent so easy that it seems a dream instead of a reality.

HELP AND PROTECTION FOR MODEST WOMEN.

Any sick or ailing woman may consult Dr. Pierce by letter without fee or charge, thus avoiding the unpleasant questions, the offensive examinations and repulsive local treatment considered necessary by many local physicians. Consultation by correspondence with Doctor Pierce is under the seal of the strictest privacy. All statesments are held as sacred confidence and a prompt answer is mailed in a plain envelope, bearing upon it no printing whatever. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

It is well to remember that the offer of free medical advice made by Doctor Pierce, is almost without precedent:

First—Because Dr. Pierce is qualified legally and by a physician's training and experience to give the medical advice he offers.

Second—Because in more than thirty years of practice, in which the treatment and cure of diseases of women have been made a specialty, Dr. Pierce has gained an experience which puts him in the front of all specialists in the treatment of female disorders and diseases.

Third—Because as chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, of Buffalo, N. Y., Dr. Pierce has surrounded himself with nearly a score of assistant physicians, each man a graduated and legally qualified physician; each man a specialist in the treatment of some form of disease.

Fourth—Because the record of cures by Dr. Pierce's treatment is phenomenal. In more than thirty years of practice half a million women have been treated and ninety-eight per cent. of all these have been absolutely and altogether cured.

There are others who make offers of medical advice similar to that of Doctor Pierce. But no such offer has behind it a medical institution like the Invalids' Hotel and a staff of qualified physicians, or such a genuine record of cures.

Women for their own sakes should investigate offers of medical advice—otherwise they may be led to "write to a woman," supposing they are writing to a qualified physician and getting genuine medical advice. Investigation would show that behind such an offer there was no qualified medical knowledge, but probably some man, who unable to write M. D. after his name, was using a woman as a bait, to attract women into a correspondence. In any case the medical advice of an unqualified woman is just as dangerous as the medical advice of an unqualified man.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription contains neither cocaine, opium nor any other narcotic, and is also entirely free from alcohol, whisky and every other stimulant or intoxicant.

Do not allow any dealer to sell you something else in place of "Favorite Prescription." If you want the cures performed by "Favorite Prescription" you can only get them by using the only medicine which performs such cures. When you ask for Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, refuse all substitutes or imitations.

THE HARLEY CASE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY RAYMOND SARGENT.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

ONE of the saddest stories that I remember during my thirty years of newspaper life was that of young Harley. His case was the biggest sensation that Chicago had had for years. Harley was the cashier of the Broad Street Bank, and was arrested for embezzlement, tried and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Two days later he was found dead in his cell. I remember the facts perfectly.

Harley had for years been the trusted servant of the bank. He moved in the best society, apparently had no bad habits, was a sociable, whole-souled, hearty young fellow, with a good, honest face and the frankest and clearest of blue eyes. At the bank he had worked up to the position of cashier, and though one of the youngest in the country, showed exceptional ability and enjoyed the highest confidence of all. One Monday morning he failed to appear. Nothing was suspected from this; Harley had been intending to go on a vacation, having been much overworked, and had given the combination of the vault to the assistant cashier. When this assistant, however, had opened the vault, it was found that it had been robbed—not a cent in cash, nor a paper of any value remained.

The police were at once notified and then for the first time suspicion fell upon Harley, for the police stated that on Sunday afternoon he had telephoned headquarters and notified them that he intended to open the bank vault in order to get out his books. When the automatic burglar alarm on the Broad Street Bank vault rang half an hour later, it was unheeded.

At once the police in all parts of the country were notified of Harley's disappearance. On the afternoon of the same day word was received that he had been captured, and was being brought back for trial.

I was assigned to report that trial. The evidence against Harley was overwhelming, yet somehow, I never felt that the boy was guilty. He told a straight story. He had been promised a vacation, he said. He was told he could take it at any time and feeling tired and nervous on Sunday morning, had decided suddenly to go for a week. His assistant had been given all necessary instructions and he could wire the directors on Monday morning as to his whereabouts. Then it occurred to him that the money he had saved for his vacation was in the bank vault for safe keeping. Accordingly, he had gone to the bank, where he telephoned police headquarters and told them about the burglar alarm, and said that he was going to open the vault himself to get out his books. He said this, he explained, because he was in a hurry and wished to avoid unnecessary explanations. He had then taken his money and gone away, leaving everything as he had found it. He had taken an afternoon train for Woodley. Arriving, he had gone at once to bed and slept late into the morning. When he finally arose he started for the telegraph office, but on the way met a young lady, an old acquaintance, and for the time forgot his errand.

This was all of Harley's story. He was found at the Woodley House by the local police. His explanation sounded plausible and no cross-examination could shake him. The bank officials admitted that they had promised him a vacation. Harley's friend at the Woodley House testified to the truth of his story as far as she was concerned. The proprietor of the hotel stated that Harley had taken a room for a week. The fact that he had remained so near the city was emphasized by his lawyer. No guilty man would have done such a foolish thing.

On the other hand the fact remained that the bank had been robbed. The prisoner admitted that he had opened the vault. Nobody else but his assistant knew the combination and he accounted for every minute of his time from leaving the bank Saturday until the discovery of the robbery on Monday. Harley's departure, his failure to notify the bank officials of his whereabouts, and his falsehood to the police, all acted against him. The case was a clear one and I noticed that Harley's lawyer seemed to have little faith in his client, but went through his part mechanically, as if expecting defeat. The verdict of guilty was no surprise.

Two days later the papers were full of another sensation, Harley's suicide. With everybody against him, a nervous wreck from over-work and worry, the dishonor of a long term in prison staring him in the face, he had broken down completely and hanged himself in his cell, using his bed clothes for that purpose.

This closed the affair and people in a great city forget such things very soon. As I have said, I always had a belief in the innocence of the boy, and did not forget the case easily.

Consequently when, a few years ago, and fully ten years after the Harley case had passed from the public mind, I picked up the latest number of a magazine of short stories, and glanced at the contents, my eyes were at once caught by the title, "The Bank Mystery, by Edward Olney." Lazily I began to read, but with increasing interest, and at its end I was most forcibly impressed by its similarity to the Harley case. The story even offered a solution to the mystery.

Either the writer remembered the case, and had imagined the sequel, or somebody had told it to him. The idea struck me that the author of that story could tell me something interesting about the Harley case. Finally I decided to look him up, and have a talk with him. This was an easy matter. Mr. Olney received me pleasantly.

"Where did I get the plot of that story?" he said. "Why, that's quite a story in itself. Last year our summer home was broken into, and I succeeded in capturing one of the burglars, and tied him into a chair. I sent my son for the village police, and as the village was some distance away, I was left for an hour watching my prisoner. I had long wished to talk with a genuine burglar, and under the influence of some strong wine, this one, surly at first, became very talkative, and told a most picturesque story of his life. Among other incidents he told the story you are asking about. He was such an interesting chap that I confess I didn't feel particularly sorry later when I heard he had escaped from the police on his way to the jail. I should know the man anywhere. He seemed to have a nervous affection, for his face and hands twitched incessantly. Besides, he was very tall, and had a head of very bushy red hair."

I was convinced that if I could find Mr. Olney's burglar, I could solve the Harley case. Fortune favored me soon after, for on visiting police headquarters, I was told of the capture of a daring burglar, and was allowed to see him. Imagine my satisfaction when I discovered that he was the same man described by Mr. Olney. He refused to talk at all.

On my way home I laid out a plan of action. I called that night on a friend of mine, Professor Le Bon, who was quite an expert in the art of hypnotism. To him I explained my plan, and he gladly agreed to assist.

Next day we called at the police station and were shown to the cell of the burglar. While I talked with him, or rather at him, for he said nothing, the professor exerted all his power to bring the man under his influence. For a time he seemed doomed to disappointment, but at length the burglar turned and faced the professor, his gaze having a fixed stare.

"Now," said my friend, "call the officers, and we'll have his story in no time."

The experiment worked like a charm. Before the inspector and three officers the burglar did whatever the professor commanded.

"Can't you tell us about the Broad Street Bank robbery?" suggested my friend.

The burglar smiled. "Why of course," he said. "I did that job. I'd been watching that bank for weeks, and was across the street when Harley went in. I slipped in after him; he was at the telephone and I heard what he said about the burglar alarm. Then he started to open the vault. 'A knock on the head, my boy, when you get her open, and I won't need to blow it,' I thought. Then I decided on a safer plan. I had a stout piece of wire in my pocket that I used in my business. As the vault door swung open Harley stepped inside. I sprang behind the door, and slipped the wire into the lock in such a way that the bolts wouldn't fall into place when the door was shut. I got into the directors' room just as Harley came out of the vault. It was risky, but I had two chances. If he had seen me, I would have shot him, and got what I could. But he didn't see me. He came out, swung the great door to, turned the tumbler to throw the bolts, and went out. After he had gone, I had no trouble in opening the vault again. The wire had kept the lock from working, and Harley in his hurry had not noticed it. I cleaned the place out at my leisure, for I knew the burglar alarm wouldn't work, fixed the vault all right and went out the front door, which fastened with a spring lock. Next day I read in the paper that Harley was arrested, but as I was leaving for Australia I couldn't go to the trial. I just got back last week."

The professor snapped his fingers and the burglar came to his senses, as surly and quiet as ever.

"My friend," smiled the inspector, "we'll see if we can't make matters interesting for the Broad Street Bank burglar."

A STUDENT'S STORY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY EDWARD JOUETT SIMPSON.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

WHEN I was at the Law-school it was my fortune to have as my most intimate friends the two "biggest" men in the University; Harris, the curly-headed giant of the foot-ball eleven, and John Holcomb, a shining star in the lecture rooms. Holcomb was also a perfectly "set up" man and so was, of course, urged to don the canvass jacket, when, it was freely predicted, he would run Harris a sharp race for the honors of the the gridiron.

To these pleadings Holcomb persistently turned a deaf ear—why, was known, or rather surmised, by only a few of his intimates. Sad to relate, this young fellow—brilliant, handsome, accomplished in all that we are wont to consider the graces of culture and refinement—had yet one vice, or habit, which threatened to involve in ruin any career which the world might have in store for him. Whiskey, love of strong drink, held him with a chain, a passion which I have seldom seen equaled in men many years his senior.

How he so easily maintained his lead at the head of his classes was a mystery to the few who knew his habits; but we believed that even he feared to dare the tempter to the long struggle, the self-restraint, which the foot-ball training season would necessitate—"breaking training" being the unpardonable sin in the University foot-ball world.

Harris and I loved this brilliant fellow and tried our best to protect him from his one weakness. I had heard of such a craving handed down from father to son, an incurable disease, but his father was a distinguished Judge of his State's highest Court, sobriety itself, so such an hypothesis in this case went for nothing.

One boisterous winter night Harris and I were seated before the fire in my room, enjoying a quiet smoke, when Holcomb joined us. I saw at a glance that he had been drinking. He was in one of his brilliant humors, however, and speedily took all the talking on himself; for an hour he held us spellbound. Finally—just as he had finished one of his favorite legends of the Rhine, I remember—he took a silver flask from his pocket and raised it to his lips. Almost involuntarily Harris and I leaned toward him, as though to catch his hand; but with a laugh he pushed his chair beyond our reach.

"Just one, boys, and then Bob can throw it away," he said, and we were necessarily content.

His drink was a small one, for his shame of his passion was almost as great as the passion itself, and then he tossed the flask over to me. Stepping into my bedroom, I locked it in a drawer, and when I came back I found the poor fellow pacing back and forth across the floor liked a caged tiger. This was his habit when one of his fits of remorse was on him—I had seen him when he was so weak that his limbs would barely support him, totter up and down, up and down the room—so I took my seat and said nothing.

Harris was busy pouring a double-handful of tobacco into the bowl of his pipe—it held a pound, more or less; he called it Vesuvius—but he looked across at me and shook his head, and I saw tears standing in the big-hearted fellow's eyes.

Presently Jack spoke, and his voice was husky:

"I have a story I want to tell you fellows. I don't know why I never told you before; and I don't know why I am going to tell you now. Maybe it will make you understand more clearly how this cursed drink has gotten such a hold on me." He paused a moment and then went on: "God knows I don't offer it as an excuse—but it is my only excuse, for I wasn't always such a weak fool as you see me now."

He came back to his chair in front of the fire and sat down wearily. We were quiet enough in the room, but outside the storm was still raging. The wind roared and whistled through the pines and around the sharp corners, and gusts of hail and sleet at intervals beat heavily against the windows; the limbs of the "Old Patriarch" at the corner scraped mournfully against the roof above us as if begging shelter for its time-worn life.

"First of all," Jack began at last, "Judge Holcomb is not my father. Twenty-five years ago to-night—and they say that it was just such a wild, stormy night as this—I was found snugly tucked away in a basket inside his door. No one about the house knew who left me, or how long I had been there. There was no sign whatever on my clothing or in the basket as to my parentage; not even an initial from which they might guess by what name I was to be called. Of course the Judge made inquiries—he even had detectives work on the case—but there was never a trace of my parents found. Finally it was given up, and the Judge adopted me, gave me his own name, and I was taken to his heart and his wife's as if I had been of their own flesh and blood. They had no children of their own, and I received all the love and tenderness of an only child. To make a long story short, I grew up much as other boys around me, going to school and to college, the Judge sparing no money or pains to give me the best of educations.

"Our nearest neighbor was a Mr. Ransome. He and the Judge had been close friends ever since they were boys at school, had married sisters, and had lived here side by side for years. I was almost as devoted to 'Aunt Mary's, as I was to my own home.

"About three years after I had been left at Judge's, Mr. and Mrs. Ransome likewise adopted a child. They were visiting Mr. Ransome's brother in another state, and this little girl had been found at the house one night much in the same way as myself; at her little neck was pinned a slip of paper with 'Ethel' written on it. Mr. Ransome brought her home with him, and crowed mightily over the Judge at having a nice little lady rather than a good-for-nothing clumsy boy. As we grew up we were naturally thrown together a great deal, and—but I suppose you have guessed that part of my story already; we became sweethearts, and built our fairy-castles as all children do.

"When I was seventeen years old I went off to college, and Ethel cried as though her little "Spring Medicines," "Blood Purifiers" and "Tonics" an Old-Fashioned Idea.

Pure blood, strong nerves and muscles, firm, healthy flesh, can only come from wholesome food well digested. "Blood purifiers" and "nerve tonic" do not reach the cause of the mischief. The stomach is the point to be looked after. The safest and surest way to cure any form of indigestion is to take after each meal some harmless preparation of this kind composed of vegetable essences pure pepsin, golden seal and fruit salts, sold by druggists under name of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and these tablets taken after meals assist digestion wonderfully because they will digest the food promptly before it has time to ferment and sour, and the weak stomach relieved and assisted in this way soon becomes strong and vigorous again.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are superior to any secret patent medicines because you know what you are taking into your stomach.

They are sold by druggists everywhere at 50c. per package. Write F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., for book on stomach diseases, mailed free.

heart would break; and it took all of my pluck to keep my tears back. Three years passed before we saw each other again; she also went away to school and it so happened that we had our vacations at different times. College life affected me as it does all boys, and I gradually forgot my girl-sweetheart. The third summer, however, we were at home together. I expected, as a pompous Senior, to give my little cousin an affectionate kiss and pat her condescendingly on the head; but I didn't. It was the old story; I had left a jolly, impetuous girl and came back to find a woman. I did not kiss her; but when she came into the room the stately personage who had asked so grandly about 'the little girl' could only take her hand in the greatest embarrassment and murmur some unintelligible words, supposed to be of greeting. Even in my confusion I noticed how the old gentlemen smiled at each other.

"Our mutual shyness soon wore off and gradually we took up the old life again, though it could nevermore be the same. But though all of that boy-and-girl life and boy-and-girl love was a thing of the past never to come again, I found that my old affection still existed as did hers; in a different way we felt it, but the old love was still there. Although I had left the girl and found the woman, I had found the same nature. The happy disposition, the bright laugh and humor were still there as of old; the love of fun and teasing was only a little more gentle, and all the more winning. And behind and through it all shone that worship of truth that had so often brought swift punishment to our childish pranks.

"At the end of that short summer I was wildly, passionately in love. I went back to college and got my degree with the first honor—for a fellow works hard, you know, when there is a woman at home expecting great things of him.

"Our engagement was announced to our nearest friends. Both the Judge and Mr. Ransome opposed a marriage while we were so young, but finally it was arranged that I should take a post-graduate course for one year, and the wedding should follow in the summer. So I departed for my last term at college.

"There was in town a young fellow named McRea, the only son of a rich banker. Although older than I, years before we had been rivals in our sports at school. He was not of much natural ability as an athlete, but he had ambition, backed by pluck and perseverance. Two consecutive years he and I had been the final contestants for the all-round championship at the field-day games, and I had beaten him both times; the last time so decisively as to cause a good deal of laughter at his expense. He was one of those vain fellows who cannot stand defeat, and he vowed bitterly that one day he would get even with me. He developed into a brilliant, polished man, with an easy, frank manner that was very fascinating. Though his bad habits were not generally known, he was a gambler and a rake, at heart utterly unprincipled.

"When Ethel returned from school he was among the first to pay her attention, and speedily fell deeply in love. At first, I believe, she liked him, but as she got a further insight to his real nature, and at the same time saw how serious his intentions toward herself were becoming, she discouraged him all she could. At last, after a somewhat painful scene, he was brought to realize that his suit was in vain. Then, man of the world though he was, he lost complete control of himself and went away swearing deadly vengeance against me—that if he could not have her, I never should—for he judged that I was the cause of his new humiliation.

"I knew none of these details until long afterwards. He went to gambling more recklessly than ever, and it was only through his father's influence that he was enabled to hold his responsible position at the bank.

"Well, another year at college, and I came home for good. The wedding was to take place the 15th of July—Wednesday. Ah! fellows, it is when I think of those weeks of happiness that I must have whiskey to keep from thinking."

Jack paused and stared straight before him into the fire, struggling to conceal his strong emotion. I glanced across at Harris, but Vesuvius was going at full blast now, and the clouds of smoke he was incessantly blowing forth almost hid him from view. It was a sure sign that he was deeply interested.

"Well," came his voice out of the smoke, rather nervously, "go on."

"Wednesday night, just one week before the day set for the wedding," Jack continued, "I left Mr. Ransome's house about ten o'clock. Usually I went home through the yards, the houses being only a short distance apart, but as it was raining, and the ground was soft and wet, I went down the walk to the street. Just as I passed out of the gate, a tall slender man passed me, walking hurriedly. He had on a long rubber coat, with the collar turned up, but there was a street-light near, and I thought I recognized McRea. I remembered that this was his way home from the bank, and supposing that he had been detained by business, I went on without giving him another thought. A few yards further on I met another pedestrian. This was a large, heavy man, rather poorly dressed, and he was also walking very rapidly.

"When I got home I found the Judge down in the front hall. He had just come down in answer to a ring at the bell, but had found no one, and after looking around a little, had decided that it was merely some boyish trick, and started to go back. Then he noticed a note pushed under the door, and was reading it as I came in. Here it is."

Jack took a paper from his pocket-book, and handed it to me. It was a sheet of plain note-paper, folded twice, a little soiled, and addressed to Judge Holcomb. The writing was uneven and sprawling, probably disguised. At Jack's request I opened it and read:

"JUDGE AND MRS. HOLCOMB:—You are about to commit a great and terrible wrong—a crime. John Holcomb and Ethel Ransome (as they are known to you) must not marry; they are brother and sister. When the boy was left with you and the girl in another state, it was never dreamed that such a state of affairs could come to pass. You and Mr. Ransome (the brother of the one who actually adopted the girl) were chosen because you were known to be kind-hearted, Christian people, who would treat in the kindest manner two little unfortunates whose parents found it impossible to raise under their care. It is equally impossible for me to let my identity be known now; whiskey is the cause of it all. In the name of God, of morality, and of nature, I implore you to prevent this marriage, which could only end in suffering and degradation. I have tried to warn you sooner, but my efforts failed. Do not disregard this, or your future life can only be one of repentance and sorrow.

THEIR FATHER."

"The devil!" ejaculated Harris, and then we sat silent.

Jack continued: "We immediately hurried out and made search for the stranger I had met, and young McRea, but could find neither. The next morning it was discovered that McRea had run away with thirty thousand dollars belonging to the bank, and neither he nor the stranger has ever been heard of since. And that is all."

* * * * * *

When I was awakened the next morning by my "sweep," he gave me a note which explains itself:

"DEAR BOB:—Have just been called home by telegraph. It seems that McRea returned home and the police captured him. There was a fight and McRea is dying and wants to see me.

Yours hastily,

J. HOLCOMB."

One week later, Christmas morning, coming down to breakfast at home, I found a fat envelope on my plate, addressed in a hand I knew well. As I opened it a newspaper clipping fluttered on to the table. I picked it up and read:

TO BE MARRIED.

HOLCOMB-RANSOME. On Wednesday evening, December 31st. at eight o'clock, at the residence of the bride's adopted parents, Ethel Ransome to John Holcomb.

AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY JOSEPH S. ROGERS.

TOM Slocum had been drinking heavily of late. As he came down the steps of his boarding house his hands shook nervously and there was a certain stooping forward of his broad shoulders not in keeping with his sturdy physique.

The evening before he had caroused at "The Fisherman's Rest" until midnight and now the terrible after-thirst was upon him; but he resolutely turned his back upon the town and walked slowly along the beach.

It was a lovely summer morning, cloudless and balmy. A strong breeze came from the south, fanning the surface of the water into long, leaping ridges of white, coral-like spray. Far out over the sun-lit sea a score of dazzling sails were scattered, while here and there the huge form of an ocean voyager stood out distinct and clear against the pale, blue horizon.

On the beach a pretty little girl of two summers was at play in the sand and near by stood her nurse, watching.

Tom Slocum passed on until he came to a ridge of rugged bowlders, jutting into the water. Here he sat down and looked back listlessly at the child. The nurse was going towards one of the cottages some distance ashore, but the little girl sat there content in the occupation of scooping up handful after handful of the sand and letting the minute grains run slowly through her tiny fingers.

Tom Slocum looked out over the ocean. There was a moisture in his eyes for the sight of the child affected him strangely. He had been letting those selfsame golden sands slip unheeded through his fingers ever since he had become a man. What a life he had led! Drink, drink, drink! Every dollar he had made by renting his fishing sloop—for he had never done a day's work—had gone the same way, every good impulse he had put aside. And now no one cared for him—not even she who had once been his sweetheart. Ah well, she was right—they were all right—he deserved his fate. He had smothered remorse in his heart, never done better, never even tried. He might try now but—— Then a dull apathy came upon him and he brooded over his mind. He bowed his head and strove not to think. He heard the voice of the child down on the sand and the monotonous lap of the waves against the rocks and—the beating of his own heart. He raised his aching eyes until they rested upon the radiant sails of the fishing vessels. The men on them, he knew, were toiling for their wives and children and an honest livelihood. They had a purpose in life—why not he? Was it too late, even now? A light of mingled hope and resolve came upon his face and his eyes grew lustrous.

Aye, the people would laugh at him, but what of that—he would, yes, with God's help, for once he would turn over a new leaf!

He arose and straightened himself. Then, with a certain gratefulness in his heart, he thought of the child.

Ah, she was gone. How quickly she must have scampered ashore.

He was scrambling down the rocks to go back to the village to a new life of honest endeavor and filled with hope and—love, perhaps, when something white just out from the place on the shore where the child had been, attracted his attention. He sprang from the bowlder and ran panting to the spot. Without a moment's hesitation, he threw off his coat and plunged boldly into the water. A dozen strokes and he had gained the child and grasped her clothing. Then, for the first time he found himself getting weak. It was far more difficult coming in than going out. He had been a strong man, but dissipation had softened the muscles that were once like iron. He strove bravely against the force that threatened to carry him and the child out into the deep. As yet no harm had come upon her for her dress of some thick, stiff fabric—had not readily taken up the moisture, and she had almost been floating upon the water. She would be entirely safe now in a minute—three more strokes and he would reach the shore. But suddenly a dull whiteness spread over his face. His legs became stiff and numb as if paralyzed. He was powerless to move them. Then, at the thought of the child perishing away from its mother, a look of terror came into his eyes. With a great effort he straightened himself in the water and then with superhuman strength, he hurled his burden towards the shore. Aye, she had fallen just out of the sweep of the waves! A smile came over the face of the man and without an effort he sank back into the water.

A moment later, the nurse came tripping down to the shore. Catching sight of the child lying limp and motionless upon the sand, she rushed forward and seized her in her arms. Then without casting a glance back over the sea, she turned and ran frantically towards the cottage.

At dusk, when the tide came in, the body of a man was washed ashore—down where the fishermen were unloading their nets. The minister was passing at the time and some one called to him. It was rapidly growing dark, so one of the men lighted a match and held it close to the motionless form of the man. His black hair was glossy with salt-water and tangled with sea-weeds, but a calm smile rested upon the cold, upturned face.

"Why it's Tom Slocum, the ne'er do well," said the man.

"Drunk and fell overboard," said another.

And the minister, raising his eyes toward the darkening heavens, muttered:

"Yea, 'tis a judgment."

Among Our New Possessions.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WHEN we remember that it is less than a year ago that the Spanish war broke out we can hardly realize the tremendous changes that have come to our American nation in that time. Should one of COMFORT's readers inquire among friends it would be a source of surprise to learn how little the average intelligent reader really appreciates the geographical facts connected with the war. It is almost extraordinary how the popular idea is often wrong both as to geographical position and other facts relative to our new possessions. If one doubts this let him ask himself a few questions and then look at the maps and see how near the truth his belief may be.

Probably a year ago this time but few of us knew or cared about the Philippines, or could have given anything but the most vague information of Manila. In the last few months we have learned much but we think none of us have sufficient information to enable us to say what will be best for the future of the Filipinos. For this reason it seems to COMFORT that President McKinley should be given time to correctly ascertain more about the islands and their people before giving a definite policy for the future.

Events have not been very noticeable in Manila for the past month. The American line has been much extended and was so thin around the city that it was impossible to withdraw troops to make further advances. The successful advance of the Americans always makes the circle of defence around the city larger and makes the line thinner.

In ordinary warfare it is calculated that a line of five miles can be held by twenty thousand soldiers. Now at Manila the lines are about twenty-five miles in extent and only about that number are holding the full extent. If our readers will stop to think of one thousand men holding more than a mile of line, against any part of which a whole army of desperate fighters may be hurled, while but few reinforcements can be spared for any attacked point, they will not wonder that it was possible for six hundred Filipinos to break through our lines and burn many houses; but not without a loss of the whole outfit. The cut at the top of this article shows a native house, by which the reader will observe that the burning of seven or eight hundred native houses in Manila hardly means the same thing as similar news of an American city would. The month has dragged slowly along with little action on the part of General Otis. He has had occasional brushes with the insurgents, but on the whole has waited the arrival of reinforcements which are just reaching him. At this writing a general advance of the American attacking column, formed after the arrival of reinforcements, is being made.

Too much cannot be said in praise of our military and navy in the East. There has been perfect discipline and the Americans have proven themselves the best of soldiers. The arrangements for supplies, etc., have been almost perfect, and there has been nothing to criticise or start scandals as proved to be the case in the Santiago campaign. General Otis like Admiral Dewey, is doing his work quietly and with thoroughness and so far has met with no defeats. It is pleasing to know that Congress restored to the navy the rank of Admiral, which has not been in existence since Porter's death, and that the President immediately placed Dewey's name in nomination, and he is now full Admiral, which places him in the highest naval rank in any nation. Incidentally it may be remarked that many enthusiasts have suggested his name for the Presidency, but the Admiral has written a letter in which he absolutely declines to have his name used in such connection. Several of the islands have voluntarily placed themselves under American colors and with the forming in of reinforcements with General Otis and Admiral Dewey we may look for early news of importance.

The affairs in Cuba and Porto Rico seemingly remain about the same. General Gomez acting for our President, has accepted the mission of paying the Cuban army with $3,000,000 left from our war fund. Investigation shows a sudden change in the Cuban army since there is prospect of pay, and instead of the usual military proportion of officers and privates we are gravely informed that there are more than half officers on the pay rolls. What these rapacious "patriots" called the Assembly, which has repudiated Gomez and the Cuban junta in the United States, will want next no man can foresee. They have developed nothing but a spirit of beggary and dishonesty and it is more than probable that when our country refuses to support them in idleness, we shall be under the painful necessity of administering them chastisement. There is little of the poetical or sentimental about the average Cuban. Meantime American capital is restoring work and industry in all parts of the island and as a whole the people are quiet. The lower and dangerous classes, however, profess suspicion of American intentions and probably at a later date will again become brigands. When the time shall arrive, like the Filipinos, they will find Americans differ from the Spanish.

The conditions in Spain have grown continually worse, and although there has been no actual revolution there have been many overt acts which, were the Government stronger, would call for immediate suppression. Rumors continue, thick and fast, to the effect that the Carlists are secretly arming all over the kingdom, and are only awaiting a proper time to make a strike for the throne. The Queen Regent's lot at this time is indeed an unhappy one. Ever since the return of the Peace Commissioners from Paris there has been constant turmoil and contention throughout the kingdom, and it is only because the country is in such a desperate condition that no one wishes to assume its reconstruction that there has not been insurrections in many of the provinces.

The return of the Peace Commissioners and also many of the leading officers in the late war has lead to a number of arrests. General Toral, who surrendered the Spanish army at Santiago, is under arrest awaiting court martial; and under the strict Spanish custom, officers arrested for court martial are placed in prison for longer or shorter time awaiting the actual trial. Both Admiral Montojo and Admiral Cervera have been arrested, as well as a number of other leading officers. There seems to be a determined effort on the part of the stay-at-home Spaniards to punish some one for the many defeats suffered by the Spanish arms.

The Cortes, or Spanish Court which is relatively the same as our Congress, was called together for the purpose of considering and ratifying the treaty of peace which was executed by the Commission at Paris. From an Anglo-Saxon point of view, the deliberating bodies of the Latin nations are often fantastic in their excitability and enthusiasm, which seems to the cooler north men as exhibitions of volatility and instability. The meetings of the Cortes were full of acrimonious discussion and unreasonable tirades and criticisms, which even went so far as to call in question the acts of the Queen Regent. Accustomed as Americans are to public criticism this does not seem much; but in monarchies, criticism of royalty always carries with it the liability to suffer under lese majeste, which is the law established under the legal maxim that the king can do no wrong, and criticism of his acts become the same as sedition. There were numerous charges and recriminations by leading members of the Cortes, and finally the Premier Sagasta in disgust resigned his portfolio, which action was followed by the entire ministry. The Queen Regent desired him to reform the cabinet, but he declined; she then named Senor Rios who was at the head of the Peace Commission at Paris, but realizing his unpopuiarity with the Spanish masses on account of his treaty, which is considered by the Spaniards as having yielded everything to the Americans, he refused to undertake to do so, and accordingly Senor Don Francisco Silvela was entrusted with the task of constructing a government to succeed the Liberal ministry. Silvela has been, since the death of Castillo, the leading Conservative in Spain. In last January he announced complete agreement between himself and General Polavieja, who represents the army spirit of Spain. He has continually censured Sagasta and his policies; but from the platform which he has set forth relative to taxation and many Spanish local issues, it seems that he has not studied in vain and that some of the reforms which he proposes would be for the enlightenment and advancement of his country. He was Minister of Foreign Affairs twenty years ago, and afterwards represented his country in France. He has had the usual ups and downs of Spanish statesmanship during his political career, Lieutenant-General Camillo Polaviega, under this ministry, has been offered the portfolio of War. He is one of the most brilliant of Spanish soldiers; he served in the ten years' war in Cuba, and afterwards was made Captain-General of Andalusia. He has been Governor-General in Porto Rico and Cuba, and in 1896 was sent to the Philippine Islands. In common with Weyler, for his extreme cruelty, has been called "The Butcher" which name, by the way, is the Spanish nickname for him and not the American.

It hardly seems possible that a single year could have so entirely changed the policy and conditions of a great nation, and yet by the success of the Spanish War America has been forced to forsake the position of isolation which has been maintained for over a century, and take an active hand in the affairs and conditions of the world.

Under the Monroe Doctrine, we neither allowed interference with American territory, nor did we seek expansion or aggrandizement in foreign lands; but the unexpected fruits of victory have left us with responsibilities from which there can be no evasion. The moral and secret help which England gave us throughout the war, and which prevented overwhelming naval demonstration from the combined European nations which were intended against us, leaves us not only with a debt of gratitude toward the mother country, but a feeling that hereafter our relations are most closely linked. Believing as we do that the Anglo-Saxon idea of personal liberty and freedom is the highest kind of civilization, and that this personal liberty and freedom supported by courts of justice means the betterment of the whole world's people, we stand ready to go forward hand in hand in all proper policies with Great Britain. Such a combination cannot but be for the world's good.

But this new position of the United States as one of the leading powers of the world, brings with it many responsibilities and new questions which did not trouble us in the days of our isolation. In the past year the most desperate attempts have been made to parcel out Chinese territory among the great European powers. By more or less show of force, one power after another has acquired or leased points for naval stations on the Chinese coast. This sort of partition of territory commenced immediately after the Japanese war, by cession of ports to Russia, England and Japan. Since then there has been a plenty of nations reaching out for further concessions of territory. The Russian and Latin nations are in favor of what are called "Spheres of Influence," that is, they

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Once more we have come to the "uncertain glory of an April day"; how fast the time flies! How little while ago it seems when we were entering upon the grim uncertainties of the war with Spain; and yet one whole year has passed over us since then, and many things have happened in the mean time. The world is not the same as it was one year ago when the smiles and tears of April, 1898, were showered upon us. Is it better? Let us hope so; let us believe so; and let us each do our best to make it so in our "one little place." Certain it is that the dwellers in the lands which the United States has released from the thraldom of Spain during the year that has just passed have great cause to remember and bless it.

And so the years go on. Spring deepens into summer, summer burns itself out into the glorious reds and yellows of autumn, and these in turn give place to the snows of winter. We cannot stay them, and we would not if we could. We can only make the best use possible of the seasons as they fly. So let us glide along into summer with our first letter, and view a bit of the world's beauty and grandeur in this "Big Hill" in western Kansas.

"In a western county of Kansas is a range of hills somewhat like a range of small mountains. The valleys between are termed canons and are covered in season by a wiry grass called 'gumbo grass'. The soil is gumbo, and during the wet weather the roads across the hills are almost impassable.

"There is one hill called by the inhabitants, from its majestic size as compared with the rest, the 'Big Hill.' And it is a very big hill indeed, towering above the rest and making them seem insignificant. The Big Hill can be seen at a distance of fifteen miles, and looks not unlike a mountain rearing its head in the blue haze—I say blue haze because it is near the Smoky Hill River, and one familiar with that stream knows of the peculiarly smoky appearance of the atmosphere at a distance.

"The Big Hill was three miles distant from our farm and yet it seemed to be no more than a half mile. But in accomplishing the three miles between one must travel for two or three hours over small hills, deep cuts and narrow ravines that seem interminable. A tour of the Big Hill is something interesting, and to climb it and eat one's dinner on its summit on a pleasant day is something to be remembered.

"On the eastern side it descends in a precipice of at least half a hundred feet, then down, down, in seams, crevasses and ravines to the valley below. The Hill itself looks like it might have been the work of a volcano, as gigantic rocks are strewn here and there, and of very peculiar appearance. On one huge rock imbedded in the hill are carved the names of the people who have visited it. The Hill has three different tops or peaks, the highest one smooth and rounding, the others more or less rugged.

"The rocks from their peculiar appearance have led many people to believe that the hill is rich in minerals, but if so, no one has ever proven it. At least the Big Hill must be classed with all that is picturesque, and well worth the time it takes to visit it."

MRS. MONA PERKINS, Barnard, Kansas.

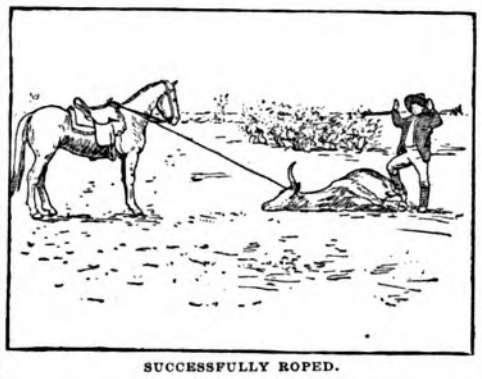
I regret that I cannot award a prize to the letter from which the following extracts are given. It is well written and interesting, but unfortunately does not comply with the rules governing prize winners; that is to say, most of the letter is drawn from the writer's knowledge of mythology, while I can only give prizes for letters which deal with original subjects.

"DEAR AUNT MINERVA:—Your pictured face is surrounded by imaginary owls. I hail from the sunny South where the living owls haunt the woods surrounding my home. The near approach of an owl, and their weird 'to-whit, to-whoo,' heard in the silence of night, is considered by the superstitious to be an omen of ill tidings. I never hear one near the house without taking a lighted lamp to the window or piazza, and, with my shoe, upon which I have made the sign of the cross, in my hand, repeat aloud these words:

'See the sign of the cross on my shoe,
It is made to prevent the harm you may do;
Go away, and your comrades tell
The power of the cross over evil spell.'

"The owl, of course, immediately vanishes, and I see him no more.

"The ancients considered the owl to be an emblem of prudence and wisdom, and it was, therefore, consecrated to Minerva. Its presence was only considered a fatal omen when it sung or hooted. Its silence was of good import.



"The story of Minerva's creation is as follows: Jupiter, the God of Heaven, had a violent pain in his head, for which he consulted Vulcan. Vulcan, to relieve him, struck his skull with an axe, when out sprung Minerva, full-grown, in complete armor. She was the Goddess of Wisdom, of Science, of War and of Arts. Among the Greeks she went by the name of Pallas Athenae, and the city of Athens was named for her. The old story goes that when Cecrops, who founded the city, wished a name for it, there was a great difference of opinion in regard to it, and twelve Gods were chosen as arbiters to decide the matter. They decided that the divinity who could furnish the most useful article for the use of the city should have the honor of naming it. Neptune, with a blow of his trident, caused a beautiful horse to spring from the earth, while Minerva or Athenae, with a blow of her lance, produced the olive tree, an emblem of peace. The Gods decided in favor of the olive tree, and so the city was named Athens in honor of the donor of this precious gift."

M. B. INGRAHAM, Augusta, Ga.

The following description of a cattle roping contest in Texas may be objectionable to some of my readers, as savoring somewhat of cruelty to animals: but in forming our judgment of the amusement we must remember that the great business of this part of the country is cattle raising, and that proficiency in cattle roping is, like skill in any business, not only a thing to be proud of, but a very necessary part of a cowboy's education: and certainly the exhibition of this skill is a sight worth going far to see.

"I have been reading, with pleasure, the letters of your nieces and nephews, and hope to be able to join your circle.

"To many of your readers, living in other sections of the country, it may be interesting to read a description of a cattle roping contest. The contest took place at the fair grounds, and several thousands of people had assembled to witness it. In front of the grand stand was a pen, in which were confined twenty-eight of the wildest steers that could be found. Outside of the pen were the same number of cowboys, mounted on stout ponies. A steer was let out, and, angry at having been in such close quarters, made a wild dash for his wonted liberty. When he had been allowed what the children call a 'hand-start,' at the word 'go', a cowboy started in pursuit.

"Then followed an exciting chase, both steer and pony running at full speed. Round and round over his head the cowboy's lariat circled, then the long open noose sped from the practiced hand toward the fleeing steer. Cries of 'He's got him,' were often followed by 'Oh, the rope broke!' Sometimes the noose, falling over only one horn, slipped off; sometimes the throw missed entirely. If both horns had been secured and the rope stood the strain the steer, still running, could be jerked down. Then a trained cow-pony knows he must stand perfectly still to keep the rope taut. Quicker than it takes to tell it the man dismounts, runs the length of the rope, and ties the animal's four feet together so he will be unable to get up. This being done the vaquero throws up both hands.

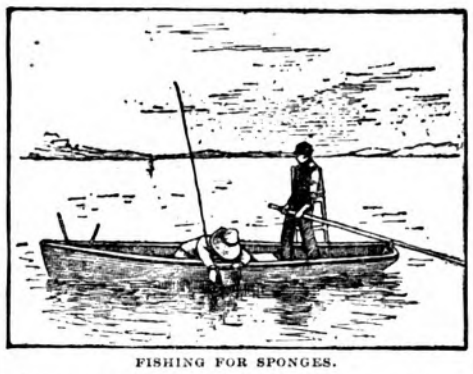
"I enclose a photo of one of our best cowboys who has just secured his steer. Sometimes the pony falls when the rope tightens. Not infrequently the cowboy suffers from the fall, but not often seriously. Some steers manage to regain their feet before the cowboy reaches them and then he must remount and make another throw. There is just enough of chance and danger connected with cattleroping, to make it an intensely interesting spectacle. The roping of a steer from the word 'go' till the cowboy throws up his hands, has been accomplished in the remarkably short time of thirty-two seconds. These contests are quite popular amusements in this part of the country, where stock-raising is the chief industry. There is always a good purse for the winner and a consolation prize for the slowest inside of a limited time. Long life to COMFORT!"

AMELIA METCALFE HARSH, San Angelo, Tex.

I have been much interested in reading the following letter on the Navy yard in Portsmouth, Virginia. To visit such a place is an object lesson in itself on the improvements which a hundred years, or even thirty years have developed in methods of warfare, to say nothing of the contrasts to be observed between our warships and those of our late opponent, Spain. Our cousin says:

"I have much enjoyed the letters written by cousins on different topics, and thought perhaps some readers would be interested in a glimpse of the relics found in the Navy yard at Portsmouth, Virginia.

"On entering the yard the first point of interest is a beautiful park, in the center of which is a tall flagstaff. On either side of a walk running directly through the park and in close proximity to each other are arranged cannon of nearly every description and size; in one place may be seen the short and unwieldy cannon used by our forefathers in their struggle for independence; in another we see the carronades captured from the Mexicans; guns which doubtless were drawn side by side with Santa Anna in his march to meet our troops. Mounted on a stone pedestal at the terminus of a walk is a stone labeled: 'Turkish stone shot from Constantinople.' Its gigantic size and weight preclude the possibility of its ever having being fired from a gun, though it has been said such were used on the Bosporus in ancient warfare. In this modern age of science and improved weapons of warfare it presents a novel but formidable appearance.



"Interspersed with the guns are pieces of wreckage from famous ships; three pieces of armor is all that is left of the once dreaded Merrimac which enjoys the distinction of being the first iron-clad constructed in America. Pieces from the wrecks of her victims, the Cumberland and Congress, lie close beside the Merrimac's armor, the sight of which carries our minds back to ante-bellum days when the old wooden ships were considered able to cope with all comers.

"In another part of the park is a gun taken from the British frigate Java, captured by the Constitution in 1812; there are also guns captured from the British on lake Erie in the same year. Three guns taken from the Maria Teresa before she started on her disastrous voyage add new interest and attraction to the park. These guns are of five and one-half inch caliber. They are inclosed in shields which bear numerous indentations, probably caused by our rapid-fire guns; they are widely different from our guns, and do not compare favorably with them. Other attractions to the visitors and relic hunters are Hobson's raft, a bronze coat of arms taken from the Colon, and numbers of smaller articles, the mention of which would occupy more space than I can be allowed."

ASHBY WATKINS, Portsmouth, Va.

Now we have a wide-awake, interesting letter on sponge fishing.

"All the sponge used in the United States is caught on the west coast of Florida, and shipped from but two points, Key West and Tarpon Springs. Of these two places Key West is the most important, being the birthplace of the industry, and still containing all the largest packing houses. Of the fleet of about one hundred and fifty vessels engaged in the sponge fishing all but some twenty are owned in Key West, but as fully two-thirds of the crop is caught between Andote Key and Rock Island and cleaned in the kraals near Tarpon Springs that town is really the center of the business.

"The vessels are generally owned by large mercantile houses which make their principal profit from outfitting the boats and provisioning the crews; though there are a few of the captains who own their vessels and depend on the fishing alone for a livelihood. The 'trips' usually last from six to eight weeks, the crews being shipped and the boats provisioned for that length of time. The vessels are small, carrying not more than seventeen men each, and the greater part of the fleet is made up of sloops carrying from three to five men apiece.

"On arriving at the sponging ground the crew are told off into the dingeys, two to each boat, one for hooker while the other sculls. The hooker is ordinarily the oldest and most experienced, so the captain is always a hooker. Each morning when the boats leave the vessels, the sculler takes his place in the stern and sculls slowly along while the hooker, throwing himself down in the bow, watches for the sponge through his water glass, which is a bucket with a glass plate in the bottom. This, being forced a foot or more under the surface of the water, enables him to see the bottom without being disturbed by the motion of the waves. When he discovers a sponge he lowers his hook, which is three-pronged and fastened to a pole some forty feet in length, and catching it under the sponge he drags it up. When the boat is filled it returns to the vessel, where the catch is laid out on the deck to die.

"At the end of each week the vessels return to the kraals, which are enclosures of stakes set in shallow water, into which the sponge is thrown to soak, while the catch of the previous week is taken out and beaten with short clubs to free it of the black matter contained in them. When perfectly clean the sponges are strung on short strings and tied in bunches. At the end of the trip the catch is taken to some central place to be sold. The buyers examine the piles, weighing them by hand, and then each one writes his bid on a slip of paper and hands it to some person appointed to receive them. He opens the bids and reads them aloud to the captain, the highest bidder getting the cargo.

"The profits of the trip are divided into shares. First the expenses of the trip are paid; then the owner of the vessel gets his share; and lastly the crew, the captain getting a slightly larger share than the men.

"The ordinary value of the sponge caught by the fleet during each trip is between $60,000 and $90,000, varying with climatic conditions, as during part of the year the water is so dark that it is difficult for the hooker to see the sponge or even the bottom."

ARTHUR M. MURPHY, Andote, Florida.

Our next letter is part of a description sent me of the city of Dayton, Ohio.

"The County seat of Montgomery County is one of the most beautiful inland cities of Ohio, and is well worthy of name 'The Gem City.'

"It is situated at the junction of the Mad and Miami Rivers. Most of the streets are broad and well paved. The principal residence streets are lined with elegant and comfortable houses, generally surrounded with well trimmed lawns and shade trees, making a very pretty appearance. The business portion has fine public and large office and business buildings of commanding appearance, with all the up-to-date improvements in construction.

"The city is supplied with an abundance of pure water and has an excellent system of electric lighting for the streets. The population is about ninety thousand (90,000). If all the streets were joined they would be one hundred and fifty-eight miles in length, thirty miles of which are paved. Companies 'I' and 'G' of the 3rd Regiment, Ohio National Guards are stationed here. No other city can boast a more thoroughly organized and efficient police force. The fire department is also one of the best in the country.

"There are six electric car lines in the city, also a Traction line to Cincinnati and one to Eaton, Ohio, soon to be built through to Richmond, Ind.

"The 'National Home' for disabled volunteer soldiers is also located here, three miles west of the city. The grounds embrace about six hundred acres of land. It has a library, hotel, theater, two churches, hospital, large cemetery and monument, deer parks, lakes, etc. This beautiful spot is reached by four different car lines and annually attracts over three hundred thousand people from all parts of the country.

"'Old Settlers Log Cabin' was the first house in Dayton, built April 1st, 1796. A sketch of this accompanies this letter."

SAMUEL R. KRENMER, Dayton, Ohio.

Have any of you ever been in a watchmaking establishment, or even in a watchmaking town? If you have not you will enjoy this description of the immense watchmaking business carried on in Elgin, Illinois.

"Elgin, Illinois, is a beautiful little town of about twenty thousand inhabitants, situated on the banks of the Fox river, forty miles from Chicago. The Elgin National Watch Company carry on the chief industry of the place, the factory being a three story building, covering nearly two acres of ground. In it there are fifteen different rooms devoted to as many departments of the work; the plate, punch, dial, spring, machine, gilding, motion, balance, train, escape, finishing, timing, transfer dial, jewel, and stem wind. Besides these rooms there are the various offices, a pretty and convenient reception room, and a store room.

"At seven in the morning the employes, numbering about three thousand, of which more than half are women, enter at three large doors; after five minutes past seven none are allowed to enter until half-past nine At seven the power starts and goes on with a tremendous noise until six in the evening with the exception of the dinner hour at noon.

"Most of the employes sit while at work, and to each one is furnished a chair, a stool, and an electric light. To each one is assigned some particular part of the work, and this they do week after week, month after month, until they become very expert in that one thing. They are paid, usually, by the piece, and some handle twelve and fifteen thousand pieces per day, while others, whose work is more difficult, perhaps turn off only two or three hundred per day. After each operation is completed the pieces are taken by errand boys and girls to another employe for the next process. Before the pieces are allowed to leave a room they pass through the office connected with that room, where they are inspected and counted.

"When complete the watches, or movements, more properly speaking, are put into large boxes, into which they are fitted so that they cannot jostle, and are then conveyed to the freight trains which run through the grounds and which take them to the main office in Chicago. From there they are finally sold and shipped to their destinations."

MRS. C. F. MILLER, Dundee, Illinois.

And now, since my space is filled I must bid you a reluctant good-by for another month.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

OF essential importance is it that you should learn, and that without delay, the cut of the latest skirt, for no portion of the toilette nowadays more thoroughly marks out the woman of fashion than this. And it is written that skirts shall cling affectionately about the hips, and almost to the knees; but from there an outward slope is taken, which results in folds that again in some sort cling about the feet.

Though here comes a disputed point, some averring that an interlining of any sort is unnecessary, whereas others maintain that the base needs, if anything, more steadying than ever. And only an interlining is capable of contriving this. It must be unstiffened lining, such as Irish linen or undressed muslin. The general effect, with certain necessary variations, tending to slimness from waist to hem. There are, as usual, many ways of arriving at the same result, but I have selected the one which lends itself to the greatest simplicity and fewest seams. It is composed of two pieces. Whether the lining be used separately or in one, it would be cut and made up on precisely the same lines, a detail that reminds us that a foot flounce of the lining would serve to set out the edge of the outer skirt in place of interlining. Stiffening is really a matter of discretion and circumstance; some materials demand a support, while others hang with perfect symmetry without. A placket-hole occurs down the center-back seam, and is faced back a good inch and a half on the right side, and a fold of equal width set on to the edge of the other. Over this entrance the pleats are laid, and either genuinely or ostensibly secured by buttons and cord loops.

Dresses are now so marked for each particular section of the day that a smart home toilette is as necessary to all as the walking dress, for the reason also that only in the street is the smart woman permitted to garb herself with a certain amount of simplicity. For the rest she must be frilled and furbelowed and aggressively feminine. This change is not one altogether good for most of us, and it is, indeed, difficult to keep pace with the times. Cashmere is a good standby for pretty, trailing home gowns. And a good idea for the making has somewhat of a princess effect by reason of the scalloped edge of the upper skirt being continued up the bodice. This upper skirt is cut in one piece by opening the material to its fullest width and placing the selvedge to the waist. The lower or front skirt follows the same principle, but naturally is not brought round so far. Black mousseline appliqued with ecru is laid on as three insertion bands, the same on the bodice, where also a deep frill of the same falls bertha-like over the shoulders and continues round the back. The sleeves are very tight-fitting, and like the edge of the overskirt are bound with satin ribbon. A soft green would combine well with the black mousseline lace, and a heliotrope shade would do well for an older woman.

The lightest colors have been worn abroad all the winter. The palest greys and fawns seem essentially suitable for early spring and in wearing them we may feel assured we will be quite in the fashion. A pretty model for a walking-dress is quite simple and of smoke grey. The skirt is perfectly close fitting, severly plain round the hips, and laced up the back with a double row of buttons and cords. The bodice is made with loose fronts and wide revers of white cloth. These form a rounded collar at the back and cross in the front, being fastened with a large, round cut-steel buckle. The vest is of fine mousseline de soie inserted with Valenciennes lace with a soft frill of lace on either side of the front.

A very fetching gown of thin wool, in a delicate shade of biscuit color, sets forth the new tunic effect, which has been so much talked of in Paris during the past winter. The skirt proper is fitted very closely though with considerable swirl at the foot; it is trimmed in bayadere effect with bands of golden-brown velvet ribbon—disappearing under the edges of the pointed tunic, which latter has for its only ornamentation a row of stitching at the head of the hem—the soft bodice opens at the front from the shoulder within a few inches of the waist line, where stitched and caught together with stiff little bows of brown velvet; similar bows ornament each side of stock which with vest are composed of creamy toned liberty silk laid in soft tucks. The close sleeves are finished at the wrist with a row of stitching around the point which falls deep over the hand. With it is worn a jaunty hat of yellow Tuscan straw the rolling front faced with golden-brown velvet, its only other decoration being a cleverly arranged scarf of creamy lace. A good model for a gown of liberty taffeta in a soft purplish blue has the skirt modishly decorated with flounces arranged so as to represent a tunic. The bodice has a ruffle of the silk set over the shoulders bertha fashion, the heading hidden under bands of purple velvet, deeper toned than the silk, between these bands and in the vest space, is set white muslin daintily laid in small, French tucks. The stock of white, has stiff little bows of purple velvet under each ear—completing the gown.

Herewith is given, an up-to-date shirtwaist in taffeta which may readily be copied in any of the pretty plain colored organdies or dimities if made over lining of silk or nearsilk, matching it perfectly in color. The back has a small pointed yoke set in tiny pleats while the front is provided with three double-boxpleats, reaching from shoulder to belt. The front pleat showing a smart fastening of fancy buttons, made of purple enamel in the shape of violets, each having a tiny rhinestone in the center in lieu of a dewdrop. Speaking of fancy buttons, the most extravagant sorts imitating jewels in the most clever way, and coming in all colors of the rainbow are considered quite "au fait"—on all the more elaborate shirtwaists. It is a pretty fad and as long as there is some actual use to recommend it, it is not unlikely to become very popular during the summer.

UNFIT TO LIVE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

It HAS remained for an American inventor to devise a scheme for electrocuting a bedbug.

The author of the contrivance is Frank M. Archer, of New York City. It consists of an electrical arrangement, which is applied to the bedstead in such a manner (as described by the inventor) that "a current is sent through the bodies of the bugs, which will either kill them or startle them so that they will leave the bedstead."

"In fact, the arrangement is such that the predatory creature, in crawling about, is sure to come upon a spot where it completes the circuit and accomplishes its own electrocution.

If it happens to be an unsually lucky insect, it is merely "startled", and has a chance to skip, giving thanks to the Providence which shapes things appropriately for bedbugs. Philosophers have long deemed it a mistake to suppose that Providence extends its interest and interference exclusively to human affairs.

The contrivance referred to, as described in the patent, "consists of a battery, induction-coil, a switch, and a number of circuits leading to various locations on the bedstead, where are placed suitable circuit-terminals." As the inventor further states, "At proper locations on the bedstead, preferably such as are inhabited to the greatest extent by bedbugs, as at the joint and angles, I place pairs of metallic contacts, insulated from each other, but so close together that an insect in passing from one to the other must necessarily close the circuit between the contacts. If these are placed on a leg of the bedstead, an insect in climbing up will, when it receives the shock, more than likely change its mind and return in the direction whence it came. In like manner contact-strips in pairs, constituting the terminals of the circuit, may be located at various places on the bedstead or on the bed-springs, which will so harass the bugs as to cause them to shun the bed entirely. Obviously the apparatus need not be in operation all the time. It may be in operation during the day and shut off at night by opening the switch, and after the insects have been exterminated from the bed it need be used only at long intervals.

In other words, when a gentleman becomes conscious of a bite, he need only press a button, and the instrument will do the rest.

CUT GLASS, SILVER TOP CREAM PITCHER FREE.
This refined Cut Glass finish Cream Pitcher is like crystal diamonds in its sparkling beauty; and is just a neat handy size for table creamer. Its pattern is the latest thing in style, and having a Quadruple Silver Plated Rim to top it out makes it as dainty as it is chaste and beautiful. Heretofore anything in cut glass has been so very expensive that the price has prevented its general use. By the invention of special new machinery the high cost has been largely overcome and we can now present a premium of genuine worth to be given free for a few minutes work. This cream pitcher with its dainty silver topped rim is pretty enough to grace any table and it will give a fine effect and make a good setting to the rest of one's table fittings. It should sell for 67c, but we will send one free, all charges paid, for a club of two yearly subscribers at 25c each or send 33c for a year's subscription and we will send the creamer to you free. CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

"IN five years' time," said a well-known bicycle expert in my hearing the other day, "the bicycle will have given way to the auto-mobile and only a few wheelmen-racers will be seen on a wheel."

While I do not believe that, it is well for us to recognize the fact that the auto-mobile has already come to be a common thing in our large cities and there is no doubt that during the coming season we shall see them in almost daily use. In New York auto-cabs have been running all winter and the horseless hansom no longer excites a passing comment, except from the country visitor to whom it is a new and odd sight. In Boston there will be established this spring a line of auto-mobile omnibuses along Tremont Street to take the place of the horse and electric cars that have been a feature of that thoroughfare since 1857. And there is no doubt that these are only entering wedges and that in a year or so we shall see them everywhere in the large cities and accept them without question. In the country, however, they will never take the place of the faithful and intelligent horse, as even the best of them are apt to fail in a snow-storm and there are times when "the power gives out". Neither will they take the place of the horse as a means for pleasure riding or driving.

One great blessing will be the dray and express or parcel wagons. These will be a great convenience in cities, as they will be more available in crowded streets and more manageable. Those of us who have seen noble horses tugging and straining at heavy loads under profane and cruel drivers will welcome the day when they are superseded by the electric dray. Manufacturers claim that these delivery wagons can make twenty-five miles a day at a low estimate against a horse's fifteen miles. They cost from $750 to $3500, but the expense of running them is only about ten cents a day against thirty-five cents for a horse, including wear and tear of the team.

The great bicycle manufacturers are going into the making of auto-mobiles of all kinds, which shows what they think of the future. At the New York Bicycle show recently an electric carrier to be used for delivering parcels was one of the cheaper motor wagons on exhibition. It has three wheels—two in the back, over which the driver sits, and one in front of the box, which contains the goods. In order to show the advantage of this carrier over a horse and wagon, the manufacturers prepared a table which showed that the electric carrier and operation will cost the first year $1,512.50 and will give 7,500 miles of service, while a horse and wagon and operation will cost in the first year $2,062.74, and give only 4,500 miles of service, making a gain of $552.24 and 3,000 miles of service in favor of the electric carrier.

By the same calculation it was shown that two motor carriers will do the work of three single horse and wagon outfits and show a balance in favor of the carriers of $2,642.98 or a saving of forty-seven per cent.

The pleasure wagons are of all kinds: stanhopes, surreys, cabs, etc. Some are built with their own power to be supplied, such as the gasoline wagons at $750, while some are to get their power from the lighting plant of the town. The storage batteries are less cumbersome than they were a year or two ago, when they were first started, and constant improvements are being made in this respect as well as in their construction generally, so that it is safe to assume that another year will see prices materially lower.

Electric carriages are built in all respects like a bicycle; even to the ball-bearings, which require the same care. Storage batteries, it is claimed, require less care than horses, though of a different kind, of course. Like a horse the storage battery cannot be abused or over-worked without breaking down. They can be charged at any 110-volt direct current circuit such as is used for lighting; or where this direct current is not available the alternating current can be transformed into the 110-volt by an apparatus which is manufactured for the purpose at a reasonable figure. One plan is to have electric hydrants placed at convenient points for the accommodation of the owners of electric vehicles.

In weight the new motor wagons vary from 2000 to 3300 pounds and the battery weighs about one-third of this weight. They look heavy compared with the ordinary vehicles but when it is remembered that the weight of these combines that of the horses and carriage that make up the team ordinarily in use it is not so bad; and as improvements go on, the weight will doubtless be decreased.

The front wheels of the new motor wagons are usually thirty-two inches in diameter and the rear or driving wheels thirty-six. The heavy vehicles have solid rubber tires while the pleasure wagons have pneumatic tires, three inches through and corrugated to prevent their slipping. The wheels are usually made with wire spokes like those of the bicycle.

So far the greatest advancement in motor-cycles has been made in France and Germany; but now that America has taken hold of it there is no doubt that we shall soon take the lead in improvements as we do in everything else.

However, don't be in a hurry to give up your bicycle, for I believe that is a thing that has come to stay, and that with the constant improvements that are being made in it, we shall be riding wheels five years from now that will make our present "safeties" and chainless wheels seem cumbersome and ugly.

In this connection it seems profitable to quote the famous prophecy of "Mother Shipton". It was made in England in 1485, more than four hundred years ago, before railroads, telegraphs, electricity, or bicycles were even dreamed of, and at a time when if a man had openly predicted such things as a definite possibility he would have been tried and perhaps condemned to death as a wizard. Now every one of these predictions has come true except that the world has not come to an end, nor seems likely to. The prophecy seems to have a direct bearing, however, on the objects of this column.

Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the world thoughts shall fly,
In the twinkling of an eye.
Water shall more wonders do,
Now strange, yet shall be true,
The world upsidedown shall be,
And gold be found at root of tree.
Through hills man shall ride,
And no horse nor ass be at his side.
Under water men shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.
In the air men shall be seen;
In white, in black, in green.
Iron in the water shall float
As easy as a wooden boat.
Gold shall be found mid stone,
In a land that's now unknown.
Fire and water shall wonders do,
England at last admit a Jew;
And this world to an end shall come,
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

Commerce of the United States.

THE United States is a big country every way. The figures representing its commerce are something enormous. The whole amount of tonnage—goods of all kinds transported—last year on all the oceans was about 140,000,000 tons, while the tonnage of all the railways of the world, carried one hundred miles, was about 1,400,000,000 tons. There are 400,000 miles of railroad in the whole world, nearly half of which, 180,000 miles, are in the United States. Of the 1,400,000,000 tons carried one hundred miles last year on the railroads of the world, 800,000,000 were carried in the United States. If to the 600,000,000 tons carried on the railroads outside of this country, are added the whole tonnage carried on the sea by all nations, 140,000,000 tons, there are still 60,000,000 tons more carried by the railroads of the United States than all other countries put together plus that carried on the seas. Our enormous crops of all kinds raised throughout the country added to the products of innumerable manufacturies establish a commerce that is wonderful in its extent.

The Post Office Department of the United States is a very expensive one, the expenditures being from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 more than the receipts annually. In Great Britain the Postal Service is a source of considerable revenue, the receipts last year being $23,550,000 more than the expenditures. But it must be remembered, in explanation of this, that Great Britain has a dense population, the country is small, and there are no broad prairies and mountain ranges to be crossed, or rivers of large size to be navigated.

"The Literary Companion" has been published 30 years, and during that time its Editor has been obliged to fight disease of all kinds, and in spite of having contracted malaria in the war of the Rebellion he has kept at his desk daily. When the country has been under the sway of fevers and other deadly contagious disease, when in '91 the deadly epidemic of "Grip" swept the land with such awful fury, he was fully fortified to withstand all of the cyclone results, and has kept as active, well and hearty as any mortal could who has overcome so many ailments. He will now tell you how to keep well yourself. You see the illustration of the Tonic Cup. Well, here is the secret. It has long been known that Quassia wood contained special medicinal properties which surely relieve and cure Malaria, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Rheumatism and like diseases of Body, Stomach, Kidney and Liver—and by long and careful experiments with this wood it is now by a lately invented new process prepared and turned into forms which are in every way far superior to anything ever produced in the line of Quassia Cups. Gallons of medicine can be gotten from one of these Tonic Cups by simply pouring water into it and letting it stand a short time, when it will be found to be changed into the best tonic medicine ever made and can be drank direct from the cup itself or poured into any tumbler or bottle. These cups are Veritable Fountains of Health and Youth. A perfect river which will carry you on to the flood tide of prosperity and long life. Every member of every family in the land should use one, and one cup in each family will furnish medicine for the whole family to drink. The problem of economy in doctor's bills has been solved, and sickness can now be banished without employing the expensive methods of former times.

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

A MEMBER or our Palmistry Club wants to know if we should take into account anything besides the lines in reading a hand. Bless me! Haven't I said enough on that point? I am sure I have repeated over and over again, the statement that everything about the hand must be taken into account; the texture, the shape, the size, the quality, the hardness or softness, in fact, all the conditions, considering the lines the last thing. Consequently as I have often said in this department, if my readings are ever at fault, it is because in a photograph, smoked paper impression or casts it is impossible to give anything of an idea of the quality of a hand or anything besides the size and shape.

Cheiro, the greatest of living palmists, gives the following directions to his student: "Examine every portion of the hand—back, front, nails, skin, color—before speaking. See whether the thumb is long or short or poorly developed; whether the will phalange is firm or supple, strong or weak. Then turn your attention to the palm; see whether it is hard, soft or flabby. Always look at the left hand before you say what you read from the right, as it is impossible to read either correctly without studying both. Next remark the proportion of the fingers to the palm, whether they are long, short, thin or thick; class them as a whole if they belong to a particular type, or if mixed, class each finger separately. Notice the nails carefully; their bearing on health, temper and disposition. Classify the entire hand and then look at the mounts; see which have the greatest prominence and which are lacking.

"Now proceed to the lines. It is best to start with the lines of life and health, reading them together; then take the line of head, the fate-line, the heart-line and then the minor or chance lines. Speak honestly of what you see, and if you see a line of which you do not know the meaning ask leave to wait before passing judgment on it until you have consulted good authority. Never hazard a guess at the meaning of a line until you are so proficient in the science of palmistry that you will be able to judge from contingent lines what the meaning of the unfamiliar ones may be. Be sympathetic; enter into the lives and feelings of the person before you and let your entire ambition be to do them good. Think of your work first, yourself last."

It may be said right here that this is one secret of Cheiro's great success; he does enter into the lives and minds of his consultors to such an extent that his power of reading the hand amounts almost to divination. Some of the best readers that I know have developed this power, also, and it is a wonderful thing and great aid to the palmist. First of all, however, the palmist-reader should consider his work with the greatest respect; if you do not respect it, no one else will.

ALEX.

So many have been asking for the above information, that I have given it at the expense of reading more than two hands this month. But I am sure all are willing to wait patiently for their turn, knowing that it takes several months at best, and that in a club so large as ours, the greatest good of the greatest number must always be remembered first.

"Alex" has the hand of a very ambitious man; one that will succeed in everything he undertakes from sheer force of will and the perseverance that goes with it. I have no hesitation in saying that "Alex" has received many a hard blow in his fights with the world, that would have utterly discouraged a man of weaker fiber; but although he has been cast down after these varied discouragements, he has always risen again and given the world good battle and so has gained what he has striven for against heavy odds. For this quality he will always succeed, simply because he never admits that there is such a word as "failure". It would be a good thing if more of our young men had his grit. The men who succeed have to have this quality and those who are lacking in it would do well to set about cultivating it at once. This man is a statesman and orator; but he is the latter only when he is interested in the thing he is talking about. He cannot get up and talk on any subject that comes up, as the born orator can; but when he is absorbed in a subject he talks in a way that makes the whole world stop and listen. In many ways this man is remarkable. He will live to be about three-score years and ten and although the world in general admires his physical condition and thinks him the personification of good health, it is only because he governs himself by that iron determination of his and will not allow himself to get sick or weak; if he gave up to his inclinations he could easily become a half invalid. In matters of the heart, the same conditions exist. He has had one or two great disappointments, enough to make an ordinary man a woman-hater forever, and inflict upon the entire sex the contempt engendered by the exceptions he has been injured by; but he knows better than this, and by sheer determination he has recovered from the blows that would have swamped a weaker man. In many ways, a remarkable hand, showing a remarkable character.

"B. S. C." has a hand almost diametrically opposite, although this, too, shows great strength of character. This person is feminine to the last degree. She dislikes encountering the world and shrinks from anything like publicity. When trouble comes on her she retires from the gaze of people, even those nearest and dearest to her, and bears her trouble as best she may; but she never forgets and never overcomes. She is very artistic, fond of music, poetry, pictures, nature and beautiful things; and she is indolent by inheritance and by inclination. She would prefer remaining in the background of home even if it means dependence on relatives and friends. She is very refined in thought and in temperament. She too, is ambitious, but she would never be willing to undergo discouragement or hardship for the sake of gratifying ambitions. She is very warm-hearted, so much so that she is destined to great suffering all her life from her affections. An indifferent word, a careless look even, makes her miserable for days when coming from the one she loves above all others; about the opinions of others she cares too little. She is a born aristocrat and I hope has sufficient means to gratify her exclusive tastes; else she will be miserable. Two marriages are indicated which will be as happy as her temperament will allow.

Two or three more requests have come in for our rule for taking smoked paper impressions. Here it is:

Take a large sheet of white paper, legal cap or commercial note. Hold it carefully over an oil or spirit lamp, or, better yet, a tallow candle, lighted. Hold it near enough the flame so that the smoke will leave a fine black deposit, without burning the paper. A little practice will soon teach the right angle at which it should be held. When the paper is well smoked, lay it, smoked side up, on a flat table or board (without a cloth). Then place the right hand, palm downward, firmly on the paper, pressing hard without moving the hand a hair's breadth. Keep it so a minute, and take up the hand quickly without disturbing the impressions of the lines in the least. Have ready some artists' fixatif (procurable at any store where artists' materials are kept) in an atomizer. With the latter squeeze sufficient fixatif over the impression made on the paper to keep it from rubbing. This gives an indelible impression.

PEPSIN-SALTED PEANUTS.

Dyspepsia, Insomnia and Other Ills Cured by the Common American Peanut.

IF the day ever dawns when science shall have robbed Nature of her last secret the world's people of that era will marvel at the host of simple things that Nature possessed for the welfare of mankind. Diligent investigation has lately discovered that the common American peanut contains qualities which when scientifically prepared and made operative with salt and pepsin in proper proportions acts with amazing promptitude on the gastric juices, relieving almost immediately dyspeptic disturbances, and, in time, curing dyspepsia in its worst forms.

To America is due the honor of having first produced the peanut (arachis hypogæa). Its true name is "goober," and Virginia is noted for exceptionally large crops of the nut. Since something of its real value has become known other warm countries succeeded in growing it. The plant is leguminous and of many branches, resembling somewhat the clover. It is planted and cared for much like peas or beans and is sometimes called earth or ground nut on account of its vines running along on the ground. Two years ago any one recommending peanuts for dyspepsia would have been geered at, and rightly, too, for it is of more recent date that the medicinal qualities of the nut were discovered. Until this discovery these qualities were dominated by an oil in which the peanut is rich. This oil is non-drying and valuable as a lubricant. It is also used extensively as an adulterant for olive oil.

Frequent experiments discovered that the peanut was also rich in nutriment, and that this food when peptonized acted like magic in dispelling heartburn, curing insomnia, and putting the digestive apparatus in working order. All well-informed medical men know that science has succeeded in isolating so pure a pepsin that it will digest 25,000 times its own weight in albumen. Pepsin is one of the albuminoids or nitrogenous substances, and it has the power of converting proteids into peptones. When the process of digestion does not furnish sufficient pepsin to accomplish complete assimilation of the food dyspepsia begins to entrench itself in the system. Then have a care, for, if its inroads are not blocked and the disease routed, years of intense suffering are sure to follow.

Everybody likes peanuts. Ever since the first "Young America" laughed at the antics of the circus clown peanuts have been popular. Children love to eat them on the sly "when the teacher isn't looking," while older persons have been known to crack them quietly in their pockets and sneak the palatable kernels into their mouths at the theater. Even the confirmed dyspeptic loves them, but is afraid. Who, it may be asked, ever expected to hear of peanuts being used as a remedy for dyspepsia, for Bright's Disease, for Diabetes, for Insomnia and for corpulency?

Germany claims the credit of having discovered the possibilities of the peanut, and an eminent chemist in our employ has demonstrated that "pepsin-salted" peanuts lose none of the peanut flavor in the preparation. Our process of preparing them is such that the oil is neutralized while the flavor and the medicinal properties of the nut are retained. This makes a food-medicine that is certain to be the delight of everybody.

In connection with medicinal qualities of pepsin-salted peanuts it might be interesting as well as instructive to know that peanuts outrank, by a large percentage, such nutritive foods as cheese, peas, beef, rice, potatoes, milk, rye flour, and veal. Already the Germans are making flour and butter from the peanut, and the success of the venture has been such that peanut planters everywhere are preparing to double their usual crops.

We are the first in the United States to prepare pepsin-salted peanuts for the market, and we hope to merit success solely from the quality of the goods which we shall dispose of through our agents at 10c. per package.

Experiments have proved that our pepsin-salted peanuts will cure heartburn and relieve all the other pangs of chronic dyspepsia.

Sufferers from the effects of Bright's Disease and other kidney troubles have noted marked progress after treatment.

Corpulency disappears because the pepsin-salted peanuts digests and makes other food digest.

Half a handful eaten one hour before retiring will induce sleep and a continuation of pepsin-salted peanuts rightly will cure insomnia.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

HERE are many helpful hints in the various publications referring to the house, and it seems as though many of our readers might be glad to see a brief list, occasionally, in this department, of general information regarding matters that come into the daily life of every housekeeper. With this in view we have made a collection, and will give as many hints as possible in the next two or three editions.

For instance:

To remove a rusty screw, first heat the screw-driver and then apply to the screw, when it will easily turn.

To make the lamps burn brightly, soak the wicks in vinegar before using, and put a pinch of salt into the oil as well. Every part of the burner should be well washed and brushed as often as once a week.

To make a good black dye, mix together solutions of acetate of lead and sulphate of iron; filter, and then boil the article to be dyed in the mixture. Rinse well in water and then boil in water with chips of logwood; rinse again and hang out to dry, and the garment will be a good black.

A medical journal gives the following recipe for preventing excessive perspiration of the hands: Wash two or three times each day in tepid water in which club moss has been standing; change the moss every morning.

To clean brass trays, try lemon juice; if unavailing, mix a little salt with it, being careful not to scratch the tray with the salt.

For falling hair use castor oil and bay rum in equal proportions. It should be well rubbed into the roots of the hair with the tips of the fingers.

If you are troubled with an oily skin, try putting half a lemon into the water jug; the water and lemon should be changed every two or three days. Dry the face thoroughly after using this wash.

To avoid the breakage of lamp chimneys and glass globes, try tempering them when new. Put them in a large pan and cover with cold water. Set the pan on the range until the water boils, and then remove it from the fire and leave the globes in the water until it is perfectly cold.

Before putting away furs for the summer they should be very carefully examined and all dust and dirt removed from them by vigorous beating and brushing. To clean fur, rub it carefully against the grain, and when it has been thoroughly lifted and reversed, dip a piece of flannel into flour and rub lightly any spots that may look soiled. Shake well and rub with a piece of dry flannel. Sable and chinchilla may be cleaned with hot bran; rub the bran into the fur and leave for a few minutes and then shake off the bran.

To clean bed-ticking, first carefully remove the feathers and then shake the cases so that all the down will be removed. Rinse in cold water in which has been dissolved a teaspoonful of permanganate of potash. When this is thoroughly rubbed in, wring and dry the cases, and rub the inside with a piece of beeswax. This is to prevent the disagreeable working through of the feathers when the cases are again filled.

Borax is the housekeeper's best friend. Its uses are many and great. It is an excellent preservative for milk, meat, butter and all animal foods. It softens and purifies water for household purposes; it may be used in the place of soda in washing linen; it cleans and purifies sponges and removes unpleasant odors from the kitchen sink. It gives a luster to glass and silver when washed in it, and cleans marble. For a head wash it is excellent, removing dandruff. Above all, it is inexpensive.

To revive cut flowers, put the stems into very hot water and leave until water is cold. Then cut the ends of the stems off and slit up the stalks of the flowers and place in cold water.

Now for a few recipes.

We give an illustration of cake, cut and decorated to imitate playing cards. These are especially appropriate for refreshment at a card party. For making, use a recipe for a good, plain, fine-grained cake, and bake in shallow pans, so when cut the pieces will be very thin. Cut in the shape of cards and frost with white frosting after cutting; then use candied cherries to show the spots on the cards; diamonds and hearts may be cut from the cherries with a knife, or the cherries may be used whole and simply stuck on, to imitate the ace, three or six spot, as desired. A cookie mixture will be used instead of cake, and then the cards may be exceedingly thin. The vanilla wafer recipe given last month is especially adaptable for this.

For a dessert, nothing is more attractive and at the same time palatable than oranges, served French style.

Select oranges having fine skins. Cut away one-third from the end of each orange and with a spoon remove all the pulp. Use only the larger parts, cutting the edges in small points. Put the skins in cold water until ready to serve. Press the juice from the pulp, using a vegetable press or ricer. There should be, to six oranges, a pint of juice. Add to this quantity the juice of two lemons and a cup of sugar. Have ready half a box of gelantine soaked in a cup of cold water and dissolved in a half cup of boiling water. Strain the gelatine into the juice, stir until the sugar is dissolved, then set away to chill. When ready to serve arrange the skins on a dish, collectively, or arrange on separate plates to be served individually; fill with the jelly cut in cubes, and decorate with whipped cream and candied cherries.

German Finishing Schools.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IN South Germany are finishing schools for young ladies, which, while they are most beneficial and useful in their work, differ widely from the so-called finishing schools of this country. Indeed, they are intended to supplement the schools which, with us, are supposed to cap the climax of a society girl's education; for, in order to be eligible to one of these German schools, a girl must be able to pass a satisfactory examination in arithmetic and in English and German grammar, and must speak and write her own language correctly. She comes to this school mainly to learn housekeeping, for a German girl would take shame to herself were she to enter the life of a married woman without clearly understanding its duties and responsibilities, and possessing a practical knowledge of housekeeping in all its branches.

These schools generally number from ten to twenty boarders, each of whom has a separate bedroom. Every morning after breakfast each girl is expected to make her own bed and dust and arrange her room. Once or twice a month she is obliged to alter the arrangement of the furniture that she may know how to arrange rooms. Every week she is called upon to take her dresses from the closets where they hang, and to pack them in a trunk together with everything else which she might need for a long visit away from home. The mistress of the school inspects her work, when finished, and points out ways in which it might be improved.

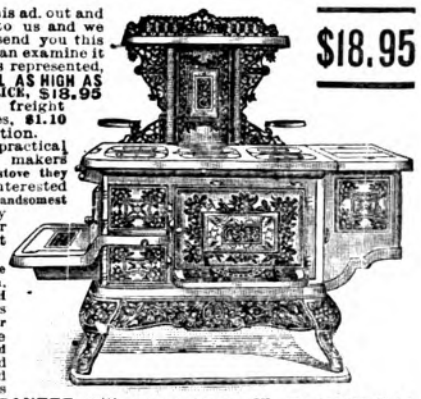
Very few servants are kept in these schools, but these few hold the office of teachers of the girl pupils rather than that of servants, and for this reason are selected with especial care. At the commencement of a term the girls are informed by the mistress that four of them are required each week to take absolute care of the house. These four must rise early in the morning, and see to the preparation of the breakfast. After breakfast they make their beds and tidy their rooms as usual, and then go around the house to see that others have done the morning work properly. The remainder of the forenoon is spent by them in preparing the midday dinner for the family. The menu for this has already been given them by the mistress, and their work in the kitchen is supervised by the cook, who oversees, directs, advises, and prevents waste.

These four girls take turns, during their week of service, in sitting at the head of the table, carving the meats, fowls, etc., serving soup, sweets, tea and coffee, or whatever needs the attention of the mistress of the house. After dinner, those on duty have, after a short rest, to arrange the afternoon tea in the drawing-room, serve it to their mates and to any callers who may come in. In the evening the four girls still act as hostesses, entertain callers, oversee and direct any music or recreation which serves as the evening's amusement, and finish their day's work by preparing supper. After all is over and the rest of the family have retired to their bedrooms, these girls visit the kitchen to see that it is in perfect order and suitably arranged for the night, look to the locks of doors and windows in all the unoccupied rooms of the house, and to the fastenings of all the outer doors, before they are allowed to consider the work of the day as finished and to seek their own couches.

The other girls of the family, who are not during this week serving as housekeepers, are taught sewing and the making and repairing of their own garments. In the morning they have their studies, and in the afternoon they go for walks. There are generally many visitors at such a school, and in the evening the girls give dances which they get up and manage themselves, of course under the supervision of the mistress. They hire the music, draw up the programmes, see to the arrangement of the rooms, etc.



The value of the training given to girls by such a school cannot be overestimated. They leave it at the end of their course entirely competent to take charge of a house; they are good cooks, good managers, good hostesses, and are equal to any household emergency that may arise.

How Some of Our Readers Can Make Money.

Last month I cleared, after paying all expenses, $355.85; the month previous $260 and have at same time attended to other duties. I believe any energetic person can do equally as well, as I have had very little experience. The Dish Washer is just lovely, and every family wants one, which makes selling very easy. I do no canvassing. People hear about the Dish washer, and come or send for one. It is strange that a good, cheap washer has never before been put on the market. The Iron City Dish Washer fills this bill. With it you can wash and dry the dishes for a family of ten in two minutes without wetting the hands. As soon as people see the washer work they want one. You can make more money and make it quicker than with any other household article on the market. I feel convinced that any lady or gentleman can make from $10 to $14 per day around home. My sister and brother have started in the business and are doing splendid. You can get full particulars by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Company, 61 Station A., Pittsburg, Pa. They help you get started, then you can make money awfully fast.

There is a whole wealth of human experience with its sadness and its gladness, in the thought of the one who said: "An April day of smiles and tears—my heart is young again."

He who is only an "April Fool" is wise beyond the limit of human comprehension. Most of us find that we must give a reluctant assent to the old childish doggerel: "April Fool is past and I'm the biggest fool at last."

It is a great pleasure to learn that there is one part of the social world where women are at a premium. The official society of the capital finds itself "long" on men, "short" on women. At a recent diplomatic dinner twenty-five men had to be bidden to the feast on account of their official place, and the like restrictions made it possible to invite but thirteen women. The embassies that have no resident women are those of Germany, France and Italy. The legations that are womanless are those of Holland, Sweden and Norway, Gautemala, Denmark, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, Peru, Ecuador, Turkey, Japan and Nicaragua.

We have long believed that America had of necessity some elements of the romance of history in its Indian tribes. Fanciful antiquarians have tried to trace in them the lost tribes of Israel and their customs have never failed to awaken interest. The rolling eloquence of Indian chiefs has again and again been translated into English for the admiration of many a would-be rhetorician among their white brethren. We have deplored the fact that our states, rivers and mountains do not more frequently reproduce the quaint, beautiful and significant Indian names. Their poetical meaning has accustomed us to expect a "Minnehaha, Laughing Water" turn to all Indian cognomens. This idea has been freely indulged in by a resident of cultured Boston. This estimable if romantic lady conceived the idea that it would be a gracious and poetical act to name her household pets after some representatives of the leading Indian tribes. Full of this thought and characteristic Boston accuracy she wrote to the agent of the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory for half a dozen Indian names. They came: Dennis P. O'Flannagan, John W. Brown, Silas Smith, J. I. Scott, Samuel S. Benton, Asa P. Longfellow, all prominent Indians of the region! After that who doubts our ability to civilize the Filipinos?

The recent strong tendency to insist that women shall be trained in "domestic sciences" as a part of their college curriculum is an evident attempt to correlate the new and the old ideas of woman's sphere. The Minneapolis College of Agriculture has enlarged upon this idea and intends to make the scientific study of farming a part of the training of its girl students. With this purpose fifty young women are entering upon a course of study particularly designed to render farm life attractive. It is believed that the boys can be kept upon the farm if they find girls who are trained to become farmers' wives. The entire work of the school is bent to the idea of making a farm home the most attractive and interesting place in the world. Plant and animal life are studied and their foundations, botany and physiology. Chemistry as related to soil, fertilization and culture and technical instruction in dairying, poultry, breeding and feeding of animals, veterinary science, field agriculture, fruit culture, and forestry form part of the course. The pupils are taught in their drawing class to design and plan farm buildings. The training of girls in this work is an innovation and the result will be watched with great interest in many different classes. The agricultural states, the people interested in new occupations for women, the sociologist and the advocates of the higher education of women, all find a special interest in this new development of the woman question.

New York State's great university, Cornell, is directing some of its great influence to the problems of country life. The schoolhouse is always a center of interest in every district but the general appearance of the house and grounds would hardly indicate this. Bare and uninviting, often unpainted, or painted in such glowing colors that the eye is wearied, perched upon some barren hill or some swamp "good for nothing but a school site," the average country schoolhouse is repellant instead of inviting. Cornell will supply leaflets containing plans for a simple but artistic school building, whose cost does not exceed that of the oblong boxes that many such buildings are. Pictures, flowers, trees and shrubbery are a powerful influence upon children. The child who receives this esthetic training will surround his own home with these elevating influences. Arbor Day has done much for the schools but much of the effort is misdirected and so fails of results. The trees are usually scattered all over the place with no eye for effect and with the result of destroying the playground space that every school should have. Fortunately many of the trees die. Trees should be planted in groups and shrubbery should help to make of the school grounds a picture. Cornell issues a circular free to teachers which contains "Hints on Rural School Grounds." The kinds of trees, shrubs, etc., best suited to particular soils are discussed, plans for grouping, hints on plants and their care. Any school district can make its schoolhouse the most attractive spot in the place rather than the least attractive as it often is. A neighborhood "bee" can change the whole look of the place in one day. April is the best month to begin such work and the circular named will furnish a guide to make the effort effective. Beautify the place where your child spends most of his day.

The system of reform by colonization is an old one and one that with but few exceptions has proven a failure. Even the strongest motive, the religious one, has not succeeded in making the herding together of those of one faith a success. Communities like the Shakers, the Economists, the Oneida community and many similar ones have resulted ultimately in failure. When the problem has been worked out with the criminal, or the defective, or the incompetent types of humanity the failure to make a success of colonies has been immediate and final. Georgia began its life as a philanthropic enterprise, an endeavor to give a new start in life to the unfortunate inmates of the debtor's prisons of England. The camp was under military rule but the outcome was not a success. It was only after people who seek new homes for the usual motives came into Georgia that the colony prospered. In view of the verdict of the history of such colonies the attempt of the Salvation Army to establish colonies will be watched with interest. There is an earnest devotion and single heartedness in the work of that grand organization that has many times achieved the seemingly impossible. It has less than two hundred persons in its colonies which are located one at Fort Amity, Colorado; one at Fort Pomie, California, and one at Fort Herrick, near Cleveland. The cost of the experiment the first year has been $45,000 and with $50,000 more it is believed the colonies can be continued another year. If success is possible the Salvation Army can achieve it. Only those familiar with the slums of great cities have any just comprehension of the powerful influence for good exerted by this army of earnest workers.

There is a certain portion of historical information that forms the stock in trade of every well conducted person's mind. George Washington's hatchet and William Tell's apple and "The Old Guard dies but never surrenders," form a part of this array. The fierce light of modern historical investigation when turned upon many of these hoary idols of antiquity shows them to be less than clay—in fact shows that they have no existence save in the minds of their worshipers. The traditions surrounding the old French prison, the Bastile, have filled a generation with nameless horror. The fall of the Bastile was one of the great events in that greatest of all events—the French Revolution. Now there arises a writer of history, Funck-Brentano, and tells us that the horrors of the Bastile had no real existence, in fact that this noted place was the most luxurious form of a prison that ever existed. Its inmates lived in luxurious idleness and were not even closely confined. Its horrors lay in the fact that people were sent here without trial. One man eats the dinner that is brought to him and considers it good, although simple. Later, when his own luxurious fare comes, he finds to his astonishment that he has eaten the dinner intended for his servant. Some prisoners had their libraries at their disposal and held receptions which their gay Paris friends attended. An indemnity was given in some cases where it had been proven that the imprisonment had been unjust. Louis XVI. intended to pull the prison down leaving but one tower standing, upon which was to be erected his statue gazing at the prison ruins. What becomes of our mental picture of the wild Paris mob freeing the victims of kingly injustice and razing to the ground the torture house of kings? It was in fact the symbol of oppression that they destroyed the Bastile and not the actual thing. But few prisoners were found in the Bastile and but one of these was a political prisoner. What a readjustment of our historical data this calls for! Another idol shattered—no Bastile of horror and oppression but an empty prison which was the mildest in Paris. What a vast and varied amount of misinformation we acquire in the name of history.

EARLY MUSIC IN AMERICA.

Some of the Later and More Progressive Steps in the Art.

The first steps in American Music may be traced back to the English Colonies of New England. Although the Cavaliers settled Virginia years before the Pilgrims reached Plymouth in the Mayflower and operatic concerts at a later date were given in Richmond, Baltimore and Charleston through the patronage of the wealthy Southerners, who sent to England for the singers, yet it is a very curious historical fact that the first real earnest interest in musical matters in this country was taken by Psalm-singing Puritans.

From barbarously sung simple psalmody there arose the present musical culture in the United States, which exists with sufficient degree and strength to elicit the admiration of every art-lover and really justifies the hope and belief that at no very future date there will be recognized a distinctive and creative American School of Music.

During the civil wars in England the Puritans, rigid in their beliefs, took delight in destroying organs, music books and choirs and even in driving musicians from the galleries. At the same time they sang psalms by the whole congregation in church. Here in New England about 1720, singing societies were everywhere established for the cultivation and improvement of church music, which gradually diffused musical knowledge and cultivated love for music itself. The Clergy advocated it as harmless recreation, and in 1712 Rev. John Tufts produced the first musical text book of America: "A Very Plain and Easy Instruction in the Art of Singing Psalm Tunes. With a collection of Tunes in three Parts."

We can scarcely imagine what would have been the surprise of these early Puritans, painfully laboring over the rude notes and printing of this early work, to have looked forward and seen the rapid strides that would be made by the art in this country during the next three centuries. Instruments, books, music and all have made a progress wonderful to contemplate. But nothing has done so much to elevate the general taste for good music as the recent production of the best music at the lowest possible price; a price that a few years ago would have been looked on as incredible.

In another column of COMFORT appears our wonderful music offer. It is exactly the same music in shape, looks, print and paper, as you are accustomed to pay from fifty cents to a dollar for at all stores, and every piece is a selected gem in its own order. No person who cares for music or who has friends caring for it should neglect to try this offer once; after that you will have it no other way for you will be satisfied with our great popular arrangement.

The list in the offer published this month contains a lot of brand-new pieces by popular authors and we would call particular attention to Nos. 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 201, 202, 203 and 204, all of which will be found leaders in their own lines. All of them are fresh and deserving of particular mention, but this month's list is so long that we do not feel competent to particularize the various beauties, for our space is limited.

It is just possible that some reader has not tried the merits of this grand offer and may think there is some catch or evasion. We will return your money if you find we misrepresent or exaggerate this in any particular. We know you will like it. "I received the music and it is perfectly satisfactory. I think it is the best I ever saw and I don't see why it is not just as good as the sheet music that I have to pay 50c. and 60c. for," writes Miss Lottie V. Codding, Mansfield, Mass. "Was more than satisfied. Was surprised at the excellent quality," says W. O. Harden, Seattle, Wash.

Thus from both sides of the continent comes the same word of praise for the excellence of the music that COMFORT sends out under this popular offer. We could add hundreds of equally encouraging and enthusiastic words from people living in every part of our country and, in spite of the vast business which necessarily must follow such an unexampled offer to the people, we are pleased to say no complaints come excepting at infrequent intervals when there is a possible delay in the mails. The offer and the music never fail to give even greater satisfaction than we anticipated. Be sure to try the offer either for yourself or a friend and show it to such of your friends as are now paying store prices for their music.

SAYINGS OF CHILDREN.

A little maiden of five recently succeeded in causing a decided sensation at the dinner table. Several guests were present, and when all had been served with soup the little one was asked if she would have some. To the dismay of her mother and the amusement of the guests she replied: "No I thank you; I saw it made—that was quite enough for me."

The wife of one of Harvard's professors was to give a reception, not long ago, and told her young son that he must stay in another part of the house, which very much displeased the little fellow. When it was time for the guests to arrive, nobody appeared. On looking from the window the would-be hostess saw several carriages drive up to the door, hesitate and then drive away again. After this had been repeated several times she went to the door and discovered that her hopeful son had tied a piece of crepe on the door knob, and the guests, supposing a death had suddenly occurred in the house, drove away again.

When asked what he intended to be when he grew up, Willie said: "If I can't have a blue baker's cart with a spotted dog to run under it, I would like to be either a tramp or a minister."

Rob always walked on the shady side of the street, because, he said, referring to his shadow, "I don't want that thing following me all around."

Little Helen was eating her dessert of sliced peaches, and finding she was getting short of cream she said: "Papa, I want some more cream." "Not on your life" said Pa. "No, on my peaches," said the bright one.

Jack, having heard some one use the expression "shoot him on the spot," was asked what he would do if he saw a man trample on "Old Glory." He promptly said, "I would shoot the spot on him."

Lowell, aged four, was always given a penny when he started for Sunday School, which he was supposed to put in the contribution box. On his way to the church he passed an apothecary shop and one day the clerk told his father that his boy came in regularly on Sunday and bought a stick of candy. The clerk was told not to sell him any more candy on Sunday, and Lowell was told nothing about it. The following Sunday Lowell put in his appearance as usual, on his way to church, and the clerk said, "I can't sell you any candy on Sunday." Looking very much disappointed, but saying nothing, Lowell disappeared. In a few minutes the door of the drug store opened enough to admit a tiny fist in which was a big stick of candy, and through the crack came a triumphant voice saying, "There are others!"

Four-year-old Grant complained of not feeling well, and his father suggested that he might have chicken-pox, then prevalent. Early the next morning Grant came down stairs looking very serious, and said: "I guess you was right about the chicken-pox, pa; I found a feather in the bed."

Four-year-old Roscoe of Bangor, had all his life been an unusually good boy, so much so that his mother had never been obliged to whip him; but the time came when the rod had to be applied, and just before the application he asked his mother if he might step into the next room and pray. Of course he was allowed to do this, and the door being ajar his mother heard him pray, as he knelt at the bed: "O God, if you're ever going to help a little boy, help him now!"

Light Upon the Dark Continent.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AFRICA no longer means to the civilized world simply "negroes," "Egpyt" or the "Sahara." It is no longer a place of mystery and myth but of good, solid, practical reality. Africa is of use to commerce, so Africa comes to be known as it is and not as poets and novelists picture it. Commerce is ever an educator.

Some things we would do well to remember in regard to the physical features of Africa. First, the equator crosses Africa about half way from North to South and it is also crossed by the two tropics, so that nearly all the continent is in the torrid regions. This would make Africa almost uninhabitable for white men were it not that a large part of this region is so high above the sea that it has a temperate climate. In fact, nearly all of the continent is a great highland, with a low, unhealthy coastal plain, only a few miles wide, along the seacoast.

Of all the rivers of the earth the Nile has probably been most talked of and written about. Every one knows that it overflows its banks every year, but how many know why? Rising four thousand miles from its mouth, far up on the highest part of the plateau, in the lake region of Central Africa, it receives the waters from Lake Albert, Lake Albert Edward and Victoria Nyanza (the largest lake in Africa). Beside this, hundreds of small streams from the high ranges of Abyssinia pour their torrents into the Nile during the rainy season, and the water flows over the low bank in Egypt, but with the approach of the dry season the small streams dwindle away and dry up, and the Nile becomes a small muddy river. The deeply cut bed of the Upper Nile shows how the river has worn away the rock and secured the material which it spreads out on the fertile plain along its lower banks. For hundreds of miles it runs through the desert skirted on either side with a fringe of green a few miles wide. When the Nile is flooded it is said to pour into the Mediterranean nearly five times as much water as when the flood has gone down. About five hundred miles from the sea is the first of the great cataracts and here navigation for large steamers stops. Caravans across the desert take up the trade from here, and the old civilization comes in contact with the new.

The great interest of Egypt is not its cotton, its rice or its sugar, but the grand monuments of ancient civilization, the Pyramids and Sphinxes and wonderful temples, many of them buried deep in the desert sand, which for centuries has blown over that region as it blows to-day. England has good reason for wishing to hold Egypt within her grasp. The control of the Suez Canal makes it possible to shorten the journey from England to India by many hundred miles. Furthermore, it is important that she should hold the Lake Region and open to trade the rich lands of the highland. For this puprose England, with her usual insistence upon improvement, is at present engaged in building a railroad which shall connect Victoria Nyanza with the Indian Ocean.

Along the Nile, England has a "sphere of influence" which has always been undisputed by European nations. It is the dream of all British statesmen to extend this "sphere of influence" through Central Africa until it reaches the English colonies at the south. "From Cairo to Cape Town" is the phrase that pleases their ears. In the the autumn of '98 all the world was roused by the news of the victory of Sir Herbert Kitchener over the Dervishes at Omdurman, opposite Khartoum. It was at the hands of these religious zealots that Gordon lost his life at Khartoum, and now he was avenged. With the occupation of the city of Khartoum by Kitchener the disputed territory of the Upper Nile was in the hands of the English and Egyptians. Hard upon this victory came the tidings that a French force under Major Marchand had appeared at Fashoda, a small town on the Nile several hundred miles to the south. This was an intrusion which could not be tolerated, for the French government had been duly warned that any appearance of French troops in the Nile valley would be considered an unfriendly act. General Kitchener immediately marched a portion of his army to Fashoda and requested the removal of Marchand's command from Egyptian and therefore British territory. For sometime relations between the two governments were somewhat strained, but in the end his government ordered Major Marchand to retreat along the Niger, over which the "sphere of influence" of the French extends, and from which direction the troops of France had come to try the mettle of England. Although the affair is not yet settled, the civilized world is inclined to sympathize with the English view of the case and to look to the sturdy Briton as the civilizer of Central Africa.

The Desert of Sahara is a byword for desolation. One's thought of it is a vast, level, sandy plain with here and there a little bunch of palm trees and a well—the ideal oasis. How different is the reality. Less than half is a sandy waste. In the Eastern part are high, stony table-lands, some of them five thousand feet above sea level, and lofty peaks, snow-capped a part of the year. When this snow melts small streams of water run down the mountains nourishing the date trees in the valleys and even making possible the raising of a little wheat. The western part of the desert is lower and more sandy, and the sand is blown into drifts called dunes, sometimes six hundred feet high. Here the simoon, or sand storm rages, blowing the dry sand in clouds which darken the sun and bring death to men and camels. An oasis is often much more than the fertile "spot" in the desert, for it sometimes covers miles of inhabitable land and has good-sized towns upon it. At one time it was thought that the Sahara might be flooded from the Atlantic Ocean or Mediterranean Sea, making an inland sea, which would be more easily used than the desert, but it is now known that only a small portion is below the surface of the sea.

South of the Sahara and bordering upon it is the much talked of Soudan, reaching from the Atlantic to the Nile and Khartoum. It consists of fertile plains and forest lands and contains within its borders Lake Tsad. This is a shallow inland sea, which, in the rainy season, becomes larger than Lake Superior, but in the dry season shrinks to one-fourth its size, leaving thousands of square miles of swamps and marshes along its banks. It is in this region that the negroes are found in their native state. They are not savages but are well advanced in the knowledge of agriculture and simple manufacture, and they carry on a large trade with the towns about Lake Tsad where caravans meet. The ivory from the tusks of elephants is their chief source of wealth. This wealth in the past was the curse of the people, for it was to bear these huge tusks that they were driven through the forest by the white man and sold as slaves when they reached the coast.

About in the center of Africa is the Kongo

AN ARAB ENCAMPMENT.

River. It is said to drain a larger area than any other river in the world except the Amazon of South America. Its basin is almost entirely on the plateau of Central Africa, half a mile above sea level. Much of this basin was probably, in former times, a great inland sea several times as large as the Caspian Sea in Europe. Finding an outlet to the ocean it wore a deep gorge in the mountains, and left upon the highland the fertile plain which is now covered with dense forests. The river sweeps down from the high peaks and ranges of Eastern Africa, foaming over the cataracts at Stanley Falls, and flowing as a navagable stream for a thousand miles across the plateau when it bursts in a chain of grand cataracts over the plateau edge and through the gorge of Yellala. Vessels of fair size enter the river from the sea but they can go but a few hundred miles when they are stopped by the falls and rapids. Goods must then be transported overland to a point above the falls where other steamers ply the river for hundreds of miles into the interior. This is the region of large, fierce animals—the chimpanzee, gorilla, crocodile, elephant and rhinoceros.

South of the Kongo, and flowing into the Indian Ocean, is the Zambezi River. Its basin is thickly forested at the north, merging into the Desert of Kalahari on the south. Like the Kongo it flows through the plateau and then falls to the coasted plain in a series of falls of great beauty and grandeur. The Kalahari desert is known chiefly as the home of the Bushmen, a tribe of negroes, very small of stature and living almost entirely by hunting.

The southern portion of Africa, known as Cape Colony, is at the end of the great African plateau. In fact, Table Mountain near Cape Town may be said to be the southern extremity of the highland. Here we find the modern civilization of Europe, its railroads, telegraphic lines and newspapers. Perhaps the most interesting industry of this region, and certainly the most important to the inhabitants, is the diamond mining. At Kimberly is the richest diamond mine in the world and the value of the diamonds is greater than all the other exports of Cape Colony.

Thus we find in Africa the newest and the oldest civilizations, the savage and the city-bred exquisite, high mountains, snow covered, descending to malaria-haunted plains. It is a land of fair prospects with a history behind it. America must look to her laurels to keep pace with Africa in the progress of the world.

The Regimental Bugler.

A True Story of the Civil War.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

FREDERICKSBURG—Oh, the mortification of it! Hearts are sore over it yet. It was a famous—defeat. Some one blundered, and eleven hundred men lost their lives, to say nothing of twelve thousand wounded and missing.

We read that page of our country's history hastily. It dims the eye to linger over it. That was fine rifle-practice for the Southerners—the 13th of Dec.'62—more exciting than pigeon-shooting, when the range was a hillslope on which were moving hundreds of live, blue-coated targets. Under such circumstances one shoots quick and shoots often. They did. They improved their opportunities. Their fieldpieces helped them, too. A single volley took off a company at a time. The carnage was awful. Regiment after regiment reeled forward to wither away into nothingness amid the fog and smoke. If you go there now you will only find those Fredericksburg slopes a bit the greener for the warm blood of New England and Pennsylvania that freely watered them that day.

It was all a glorious blunder—a grand mistake, that makes us prouder of a country that could rear such valorous men as fought on either side of Marye's Heights in '62.

Those slaughtered brigades be it remembered were not composed of mere automata, but of live, loving, active men, to most of whom life was fair and sweet and hopeful. Many of them on going to the seat of war had left their hearts at home in the keeping of mother, or sister, or wife—by whom mayhap they were being prayed for just then when the death fiend was sporting and revelling on the Fredericksburg slopes. Poor fellows! they needed it.

One of these gallant blue coats, to whom life was dear and full of promise, was the regimental bugler of the—th New York Volunteers. His name was Schulz. He played the bugle divinely—had practiced the art for fifteen years in the French Army, and was possessed of a foreign musical reputation. He was simply an institution in the regiment. The men would follow anywhere when he played the "Advance"—even though it were across a muddy creek. Bugler Schulz was possessed of a sense of his importance as a source of melody and of inspiration. He "magnified his office."

At a certain juncture in the bloody assault at Fredericksburg, Gen. Zook the gallant officer who lost his life at Gettysburg, stood, calm and undisturbed, on a rise of ground commanding his brigade. Of course his trumpeter was near him—Schulz was always to be found where duty called, ready to repeat all orders on his bugle. The bullets were flying thick and fast. Life was held but cheaply in that particular place at that particular time. The considerate Zook bade his bugler slip behind a brick wall conveniently near, where he could as readily hear and far more comfortably execute all commands given by the brigadier. Schulz declared he was not the man to skulk—a post not too dangerous for his commanding officer was not too dangerous for him. A brave speech! the last he ever made. A few moments later he fell—his life a sacrifice—his honor unstained.

He was left there on the field, with hundreds of other unsung heroes. There was no one to pick up his fallen bugle and sound the "Retreat" over his grave. Indeed we don't know that he had so much as a grave, for awhile at least. You see so many needed burials all at once—a bloody battlefield like Fredericksburg calls for so many undertakers. The soft, mellow bugle notes were never sounded over Schulz's last resting-place, though we think he would have liked nothing better. His sole requiem was the rumble of gun-carriages to the rear.

But perhaps that night, when the field-pieces had ceased their booming, and all was still on the battlefield across the Rappahannock, while the sad stars looked pityingly down upon the upturned faces and distorted forms of the Union dead, some angelic visitor from a more peaceful world drawing near with a throng of invisible companions blew gently on a seraphic trumpet the sad, low notes of "Taps"—whereof mayhap the echoing tones are even yet softly reverberating along the calm, Celestial Hills.

In a humble tenement house in New York, a mother was watching over the cradle where lay, consuming away with fever, her beloved little Hans. Care and anxiety had cut their tell-tale furrows deep in her strong German face. She was worn with watching—but evidently the end was near—soon there would be stillness, and dreadful reaction, when she could sleep on and take her rest! The doctor had told her he could do nothing more. The minister was there, to speak a word of comfort. He spoke out the thought lying in the mother's mind.

"Mrs. Schulz, it is time to telegraph your husband at the front—to call him home."

Tears were her only answer.

A little later a man in clerical dress was writing a despatch at the district telegraph office. The writing was blurred here and there as he handed it to the operator, for a few truant tears had fallen upon it. It read:

TO JOHN E. SCHULZ,
Chief Bugler, —th N. Y. V. Regt.
"The baby is dying. Come home at once if possible."
EMILY SCHULZ.

Chaplain Wright of the —th N. Y. was picking his way through the mud to the field station of the U. S. Military Telegraph, back of the Falmouth Heights whence Burnside had crossed into Fredericksburg with so much difficulty. Gen. Zook had ordered the Chaplain to report by telegraph the tragic death of her husband to the widow of Schulz the bugler. Entering the tent furnishing housing to the instruments of the field telegraph and to the redoubtable old sergeant presiding over them, Chaplain Wright handed in the despatch destined to convey so much sorrow to the lonely and grieving woman in the shabby New York tenement. The sergeant read it, then, without a word, matched it with a telegram which had just arrived from that distant city. He said nothing—for veteran of a hundred fights though he was, he could not command his voice sufficiently to speak. He knew and loved John Schulz. Moreover, he had a wife and boy of his own at home.

The Chaplain read the incoming despatch. It was that which urgently called upon the absent father to come home quickly that he might look once more upon the face of his little child.

"Such is life—such is war!" murmured the Chaplain, as he turned sadly away. "This is the 'valley of the shadow,' for man and for nation. This is death's hour—but life and Union shall be and reign beyond and after all!"

A Sketch of Provincetown.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AN INTERESTING and quaint little place is Provincetown, situated on the tip end of Cape Cod, where it nestles, almost buried in the sand dunes of which the Cape is composed. Years ago when the whale fisheries flourished, Provincetown, with New Bedford, was one of the richest towns in the state. Then with the discovery of petroleum, the whale fisheries died out. The big whalers lie rotting at their wharves, deserted and forgotten.

The fishermen of to-day do not go on long cruises, but are what are called "fresh fishermen." They start out early in the morning, haul up nets, and then start for Boston at full speed. The first boat in gets the best price for its cargo, and many exciting races are the result. Some of these boats can go in very fast time. Though rough in appearance, they are many of them "Burgess" models, and handled as they are by born sailors, they are capable of great things. All the fish caught here is not taken to Boston however. One or two of the great Boston fish merchants have packing houses here, and so a market is found at home for some fish. The process of packing and salting is very interesting. The cod is cleansed, split and dried, sun-cured and packed in wooden boxes. The day I visited the place a boatload of mackerel had just arrived. These were cleansed and split, then put into large kettles and boiled. Then they were packed in cans, the tops soldered on, and after they had cooled the labels were pasted on. In all these processes the most scrupulous cleanliness was observed.

Fishy reminiscences will forever linger in the memory of the visitor to Provincetown. The whole place smells of fish—every yard is filled with racks for drying fish—all the eating places feed you with fish—every man young or old that you see either has been or will be a fisherman. Even the solitary barber in town the day I arrived, shaved me (I judged by the feeling) as if he were skinning a fish.

In winter many of the fishermen join the crews at the life-saving stations that are so numerous along this terribly treacherous coast, and here they do yeoman's work in saving life and property.

But to tell about the town. The main street runs close to the water's edge, leaving just room for a line of fish-houses and wharves. On the other side are the houses. This street boasts of a plank walk, which, by the way has a history. After the Civil War, a certain sum of money was left in the state treasury to be divided among the different towns. Provincetown held a meeting to decide how to spend its share. Some proposed a plank walk, while others bitterly opposed it. Their fathers, they said, had never had one, why should they hold themselves better than their fathers? However, it was decided to build the walk, but so strong was the feeling that to this day some of the opponents of the walk have never set foot upon it. Walking up the street one sees strange sights. In one yard the skull of a whale is set up as an ornament, its jaws open and gaping at the heavens, and used now for the peaceful purpose of training nasturtiums. In another yard we find for an ornament a large carved figure which the owner, an old sea-captain assures us is the figure-head of an East India trader, picked up by himself floating in the Indian ocean. The work on the image is a fine bit of wood-carving, though it shows hard usage.

Before our tour of exploration is finished we meet the town crier, for this primitive method of publishing news is still preserved here. With a large bell in his hand he plods along, stopping every few rods to make his announcement.

Summer visitors are discovering Provincetown, and with their coming some of the quaint old features are disappearing, though enough remain to be a delight to lovers of the old town.

A Twentieth Century Wonder.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ONE of the latest scientific wonders is liquid air. It has been a well-known fact among chemists that no given vapor is constant; that at proper temperature and pressure it would become a liquid. Several years ago, French chemists succeeded in liquefying air. This was done by subjecting it to immense pressure, and at the same time to an extremely low temperature. It has remained for an American, Mr. Charles E. Tripler, to manufacture liquid air in larger quantities. While Mr. Tripler has not perfected as yet his arrangements for production on a large enough scale for commercial purposes, he is evidently upon the right track.

The apparatus he uses consists of a powerful air-pump and compression, which forces the atmospheric air into a chamber, under a pressure of hundreds of tons; so great indeed, that 800 cubic feet of air are compressed to one cubic foot. This chamber is cooled to the inconceivable temperature of nearly 312 degrees below zero.

The air when liquefied can be poured like water, and carried in a can safely provided its gases are not confined. For transportation it is poured into an open tin vessel, a large can, holding several gallons. This is wrapped in felt, and is set into another vessel. In this way Mr. Tripler has carried his air with safety and kept it for thirty-six hours.

As yet, the new fluid has been used mainly for experimental purposes, and wonderful indeed are these experiments. Liquid air is a colorless liquid, except for the faintest possible blue tinge. It may be dipped up in an ordinary tumbler. Fill a glass with it—it evaporates in less than half an hour, while the outside of the glass is covered thick with frost. Should an iron dipper be used to hold the fluid, the intense cold affects the iron, making it as brittle as glass. Until they again regain their ordinary temperature, iron and steel are thus affected. Copper, gold, aluminum, and some other metals, however, are not so affected. Neither is leather, though rubber becomes extremely pliable.

It is possible for one to dip his hand into liquid air, but it must be removed again instantly. On the same principle, one may dip his hand into a pot of molten metal, provided it is instantly withdrawn. The moisture on the hand forms a cushion between the liquid in either case for an instant. Should the hand be held in the fluid too long, however, a frost-bite, as painful as a burn, would be the result. On withdrawing the hand from the air it is found to be perfectly dry. Some of the liquid dropped on a piece of cloth does not wet it, but where the liquid has touched the cloth it is covered with a white frost. A piece of meat dipped into the liquid air becomes frozen as hard as stone, and can be pounded into a fine powder.

Mercury, which does not freeze under ordinary conditions is frozen as hard as a bar of iron on exposure to this air. When thus frozen it remains solid for a long time. Alcohol, also, which is harder to freeze than mercury, becomes solid and forms beautiful white crystals.

Though so intensely cold, liquid air has the appearance of being very hot, and bubbles and boils away, though the edges of the vessel containing it are covered with frost. An interesting experiment is shown by putting some of the liquid air into a tea-kettle. It boils steadily. Put the tea-kettle over a Bunsen burner, and while the boiling is not so rapid, a sheet of ice forms on the kettle directly over the flame. A lump of ice dropped into the kettle makes the air boil more briskly, and water poured into the kettle increases the boiling greatly, while the water is frozen into dry white lumps of ice.

What the discoverer calls a geyser is made as follows: A test-tube is partly filled with liquid air. The end of the tube is closed with a cork, through which a glass tube passes, just dipping into the liquid air. The air at once rushes through this glass tube, making clouds of steam several feet high. The test-tube cannot be held in the hand long, or a severe frost bite would result.

Another interesting experiment is made as follows: A thin glass tumbler is filled with the liquid air, and is set in a vessel of water. At once a thin coating of ice is formed on the outside of the glass. After this has been repeated several times, the tumbler is enclosed in a thick cup of ice. The tumbler is now removed, and liquid air is poured into the icecup. A steel wire with a lighted match attached is now dipped into the liquid, and the steel at once burns and melts, giving off brilliant sparks. After the experiment, globules of melted steel are found at the bottom of the icecup. The wonderful feat of melting steel in a crucible of ice has been accomplished. This is especially wonderful when we reflect that steel is one of the most refractory of metals, and under ordinary conditions requires a heat of thousands of degrees to melt. Other more inflammable objects ignited and thrown into the icecup, flash up like gunpowder.

The explosive power of this fluid is shown by putting a few drops into a heavy copper tube. A plug is driven tightly in the open end, but is at once forced out by the confined gases. The effect is the same as that of water confined in a white hot tube. Cotton waste saturated in liquid air is put into a stout steel tube, open at both ends. A spark is applied, and the steel is torn into thousands of pieces.

Though as yet hardly more than a wonderful curiosity, the discoverer claims that liquid air is destined, when methods for its economical production are perfected, to become one of the most useful of agents.

For refrigerating it will be invaluable and no difficulty will be experienced in keeping food by its use, indefinitely. Not only that, but houses may be cooled in summer as easily as they are now warmed in winter, while the by-product will be pure air instead of stifling gases, such as arise from combustion. In hospitals pure air, entirely free from germs, can be supplied, while safety for nurses and advantage to patients in many contagious and fever cases could be assured by keeping the air at a low temperature. Especially would this prove valuable in tropical countries. In medicine liquid air could be used in cauterizing wounds, and would be safer and more effective than the agents now employed.

As an explosive, cotton soaked in liquid air would be terribly effective as well as safer, since it would not explode by concussion, but only by a spark. It could also be used in place of steam for propelling vessels, the outside air would furnish heat enough for its action. In submarine navigation especially this would prove valuable, as after being used to propel the vessel it could be used for breathing, and would furnish a good supply of fresh, pure air. Being compact and very easy to carry, vessels could save the weight of the vast quantities of coal they are obliged to carry and so could travel faster on account of the loss of weight. Liquid air might also help out the problem of aerial navigation. On account of its peculiar properties it could be easily carried, and could be used in boilers made of lighter material than iron. This loss of weight would be a highly important consideration.

The discoverer claims, and with good right, that liquid air, when its economical manufacture has been completed, will be no less a boon to civilization than is electricity. We may hope to see it an established fact as one of the marvels of the twentieth century.

THE GREAT PACIFIC BRIDGE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AND now the next wonder we may expect is a bridge across the Pacific! When this astounding fact is brought to our notice we immediately think up and down our map and then we explain, "Why, certainly over Behring Strait." But no, we are told to guess again. Probably every one has some idea of the distance across the Pacific Ocean. It may be measured in nothing less than thousands of miles and to cross it one must undergo the discomforts of a voyage which takes weeks and possibly months. Then what a boon to be able to cross in a comfortable Pullman, to be able to go from New York, Boston or Montreal round to Paris, Berlin or Rome without leaving the train. This all seems like a fairy tale, but is it any more wonderful than what has already been accomplished by nature? And this bridge is now in process of construction and each year brings it nearer completion. This work is not done under the eye of a corps of civil engineers and by a gang of laborers, but according to laws no less absolute than those of the architect and by methods far more sure than those of the contractor. This wonderful bridge is being formed by the chain of islands at the south of Behring Sea, near Alaska.

A reference to a map will show the long point of land reaching out toward Asia which we call the Peninsula of Alaska. From this point is a well-defined chain of islands reaching across to the Peninsula of Kamschatka in Asia. This is the line of a fold in the earth's crust and it is slowly but surely rising higher and higher, and the islands at present visible are only the high peaks of a mountain chain, while the valleys are below water in the narrow straits and channels between the islands. Long ago the Russians called this chain the Aleutian Islands from their word aleut, which meant a rock, and the name is most characteristic for they are all formed by a volcanic action and are many of them devoid of vegetation as yet.

Not long ago a new island appeared out of the ocean and its emergence into this world of ours was most romantic. During the night strange lights and fires were seen for miles about, and presently this great mass of rock, accompanied by steam and smoke rose from the ocean and grew higher and higher until it overtopped the ocean by fifteen hundred feet. This was the birth of Bagislov Island. Recently this island has been in active eruption, as have several other islands of the group. These islands lie between 50 and 55 degrees N. and the climate is of course cold, so that the inhabitants depend almost entirely upon fishing for their sustenance. The natives are a short, plump people, more like the Asiatic than the American type. Their skill in seal fishery is their one accomplishment and this is most unsportsmanlike. The seals are driven up on to the low shore in a place from which they cannot easily escape and then, being helpless, they are clubbed to death and skinned on the spot. The Pribyloff Islands, just north of the Aleutian, are said to be the most productive seal fishery in the world.

But now the question naturally comes: What causes this great upheaval of the earth along this chain of islands? Far up on the summits of the Rocky Mountains, perhaps a thousand miles from Behring Sea, this work begins in the little rills which flow down from the summits, each drop laden with its particle of soil for the great river Yukon. This river is seldom understood for it has been little known until lately. It is, in reality, one of the largest river systems of the world and sends as much water into the sea as does the Mississippi. Through its long course from the mountains the amount of rock material which it gathers is enormous and all this rock waste, or detritus, is spread out upon the bottom of Behring Sea. The enormous delta which the Yukon has already built shows its ability in land building. It is said that the Mississippi builds a mile of dry land at its mouth in every sixteen years, and there is every reason to believe that the Yukon builds as rapidly. Already it has added thousands of square miles to the Alaskan territory and has made the waters off-shore so shallow that only small vessels can enter the river. Thus Behring Sea will probably, after a time, become dry land over which the way will be easy to Asia. But long before that happens our island bridge will be complete, for the constant deposition of such vast quantities of material upon the floor of the sea causes a sinking of that region and that, in turn, causes the islands to be lifted, for the earth is in such a condition that a depression in one place causes uplift in another. When the uplift has reached such a height that all the valleys are above the level of the sea, our bridge will be complete, and by that time, a railroad across Siberia having been built, our trip from New York to Paris by way of Asia, will be possible.

Shall we live to see all this? Perhaps not, but what matters it? It is well to know toward what this world is tending though we may not see the consummation of the work. The achievements of Nature are far too vast to be accomplished within the span of one human life.

and money, he bowed in silence to pray towards Mecca, when suddenly he recognized in the holy keeper of the tomb his old servant Mohammed. "Salam alaykoom", said Sheikh Ali. "Alaykoom essalam," replied Mohammed. When he asked him how he came there, and how he found this tomb, Mohammed replied, "This tomb, is a great 'sirr,' or mystery, and I am forbidden to utter the secret." "But you must tell me," said Sheikh Ali, "for I am a father to you." Mohammed refused and Ali insisted, until at length Mohammed said, "My honored Sheikh, you remember having given me a donkey. It was a faithful donkey, and when it died I buried it. This is the tomb of that donkey!"

"Mashallah! Mashallah!" said the Sheikh Ali, "the will of Allah be done!" Then they ate and drank together, and renewed the memory of their former life, and then Sheikh Mohammed said to Sheikh Ali. "My master, as I have told you the mystery of my prophet's tomb, I wish to know the secret of yours."

"Impossible," said Ali, "for that is one of the ancient mysteries, too sacred to be mentioned by mortal lips."

"But you must tell me, even as I have told you." At length the old Sheikh Ali stroked his snowy beard, adjusted his white turban, and whispered to Mohammed, "And my holy place is the tomb of that donkey's father!" "Mashallah," said Mohammed, "may Allah bless the beard of the holy donkeys!"

Hens' Eggs and Their Make-Up.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE farmer's wife usually falls the duty of taking care of the chickens, and the cash received for eggs sold is commonly regarded as her special perquisite. With the "egg money" she buys her dresses and the few simple luxuries that signify so much to her in the way of comfort. Indeed, what the rural housewife does not know about hens and eggs would seem to be hardly worth knowing.

And yet it would appear that even she might learn a thing or two from certain investigations which experts of the Department of Agriculture have been making recently. Take for example the make-up of an egg, considered with reference to its food value. Sixty-six per cent. of it, the experts have learned, is just ordinary water; a little over 10 per cent. is shell, and 1 per cent. more is mineral matter contained in the material of the inside. This calculation leaves 23 per cent. of food substance, of which two-thirds is muscle-forming stuff, the remaining third being fat.

Now, it is often said that there is as much nourishment in one egg as in a pound of meat. This, the experts declare, is not true. Eggs are just about as nutritious as lean beef, pound for pound, but an egg weighs only two ounces. Accordingly, it would appear that eight eggs are required to furnish the equivalent of a pound of meat as food for a workingman.

Another popular notion, long accepted, has been exploded by the investigators—namely, that brown-shelled eggs are more nutritious than white-shelled eggs. In order to make sure of the facts in this case, the experts analyzed the brown eggs of Partridge Cochins, Dark Brahmas, Black Langshans, Wyandottes, and Barred Plymouth Rocks, and the white eggs of Brown Leghorns, White Minorcas, and Black Minorcas. As a result, it was found that there was no difference between white eggs and brown eggs in respect to food value.

Next, experiments were made with the eggs of several breeds of hens, to find out if those laid by any particular variety had superior food value. It was proved, however, that they were all about the same in this respect. Then the effect of various kinds of rations on the composition of eggs was tested, some of the hens being fed on meat scraps, others on wheat, and others yet on corn and rice meal. It did not appear that the diet made any difference in this regard. Lastly, it was ascertained, by boiling eggs different lengths of time and digesting them artificially in a pepsin solution, that hard-boiled eggs are quite as digestible as soft-boiled ones—a conclusion directly opposite to long-accepted theory.

The old-fashioned "schoolmarm" used to teach her pupils that the bones and beak of a newly hatched chicken were made out of the white of the egg and the flesh and feathers from the yolk. It is safe to say that the average farmer's wife to-day knows a great deal better than that. She is probably aware that the white spot on one side of the yolk is the germ of the fowl that is to be, and that the developing bird derives its sustenance first from the yolk and next from the white. When the food supply thus provided by nature is exhausted, the chick is ready to chip the shell.

If a human infant one day old were able to walk about and pick up a living, the case would be considered marvelous. The chick, however, unlike the child, inherits experience, and when it emerges from its shell, has already solved a variety of problems, including those of locomotion on two legs, the edible properties of many food substances and the vocabulary of its anxious mother. This, however, is not a discussion of chickens but of eggs, and it ought not to be brought to a conclusion without some reference to the art of preserving eggs, upon which so much attention has been bestowed within the last few years.

Eggs, of course, are vastly cheaper and more plentiful in summer than in winter, and wholesale dealers in the cities have adopted the practice of gathering them up by millions from the farmers in the warm season and holding them over for sale during the cold months. Indeed, bakers and confectioners depend almost entirely upon preserved eggs for their winter supply. Up to date no thoroughly successful method of accomplishing this sort of preserving has been discovered, though a gigantic fortune awaits the inventor of a satisfactory process. Cold-storage does fairly well, but the eggs must not be frozen, and so decomposition is arrested only to a certain extent. Varnishes of vaseline and other substances have been tried, but the difficulty always lies in the fact that each egg encloses some air, and with the air germs of decay. The best process found thus far is to keep the eggs in lime-water, and in this way immense numbers are preserved annually. It is obvious that anybody who can buy summer eggs at twelve cents a dozen and sell them in winter, strictly fresh, at thirty cents a dozen, will soon be a millionaire.

From the wild "jungle fowl" of India, which lays only a few small white eggs annually, all modern varieties of chickens are known to be descended. Out of this bird, by breeding, has been developed a feathered creature that lays nearly all the year round, and which produces its own weight in eggs in six weeks! The individual egg, be it realized, has been multiplied in weight by five. Thus the modern hen's egg may be regarded, in a sense, as an artificial product. To accomplish this wonderful result many thousands of years have been required, and it is known that the Chinese, long before the beginning of the Christian era, bred chickens and domesticated several improved varieties of them. Even in those days they understood the use of incubators.

People who live in cities complain that they find it very difficult to get fresh eggs at any cost. This is because so many buyers and sellers intervene between the hen and the consumer. Eggs are sometimes collected from the farmers by men who drive about in buggies and gather them at a stated price. One farmer may have thirteen, and another thirteen dozen; there is nothing regular about the crop, and the eggs may have been accumulating for a period greater or less. Other eggs are exchanged by the farmers' wives for goods at the village stores, and in this way millions are brought to market, the storekeepers having relations with wholesalers' agents. Eventually, whatever may be the method, the eggs arrive at the wholesale houses in the cities, where they undergo first of all a process of classification.

This process is accomplished by what is known as "candling". That is to say, an expert, in classifying the eggs, holds each one for a moment between his eye and a candle. If perfectly fresh, all parts of it will appear clearly illuminated. The slightest staleness will be shown by a certain degree of opacity. So easy is it to test eggs in this way, in a dark room, that any housewife can do it satisfactorily for herself without any practice at all. An adept in the business, however, is able to "candle" in a day's work of ten hours, fifteen barrels of eggs. Improved methods of candling have been adopted recently, one of which consists in putting the eggs in a wire crate and placing the latter upon a sheet of glass through which a powerful electric light shines from beneath. This instantly betrays any stale specimens, which are readily removed.

The cracked eggs go to bakers and to cheap restaurants, at half-price. The hopelessly rotten ones are bought by leather manufacturers. Those which are only partly "gone" are sold mostly to poor Hebrews, at five cents a dozen wholesale. In the large cities eggs of this class are usually retailed afterwards by liquid measure, at so much a pint, being separated from the shells. They may not be specially appetizing, but they afford a great deal of nutriment in proportion to their cost.

THE MINUTE MAN.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

TO read of the places of historical interest in Massachusetts is one thing—but to actually visit them is an occurrence to be treasured as long as life lasts.

Of course Plymouth comes first in our desires, and here are to be seen, among many other things, the Rock, now carefully guarded by being enclosed within an iron railing; Pilgrim Hall, with its many relics of our forefathers, the old graveyards in which they were laid to rest, and the Statue of Hope, presented by the late Oliver Ames, in memory of the Pilgrims.

At Salem and in Boston are numberless historic places—and at Concord and Lexington we find the old battlefields and relics of the revolution. Here we may spend days and days in quiet enjoyment. The towns in themselves are extremely beautiful and restful, so there is no desire to leave them even after everything has been seen. At Concord we find Sleepy Hollow, in which lies at rest Hawthorne, Emerson and Thoreau. Here also we find the beautiful statue of the Minute Man, which stands at the end of the bridge crossing the Concord river. This statue shows a finely built young man, dressed in the Continental costume and holding a musket—one hand resting on a plow. The figure is mounted on a huge square granite pedestal, upon which is inscribed the following verse:

"By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled;
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world."

For the Sake of Illustration.

BY MRS. E. S. L. THOMPSON.

"Annie," he said drawing his chair nearer the divan on which a woman with snow-white hair sat toying with a current magazine.

"Meeting you here to-day is the unexpected! Twenty-five years since you refused to run away and marry me. Twenty-five years since I laid my hand on your brown curls in a parting blessing! You married the man of all men—Annie I would rather have seen you dead than wed to him! Yet, God knows, when I heard the wedding bells had rung I prayed for His blessing on you and yours! Where is—Edward?"

"Dead, five years ago!"

"And your children? Three little boys and a girl, Jack told me."

"All gone but Donald, the eldest, he is in South America."

"And you are alone, all alone?"

Richard Cathcart left the chair and sat down beside her. Yet neither kiss nor caress did he offer!

"We have both suffered," he said very gently. "I should have been more patient and waited your father's pleasure. He would have yielded in another year when you were older. When I joined the Regular Army I expected to remain indefinitely.

"Instead I served ten years; how faithfully my crutches can attest. Since my discharge I have roamed over the world." He smiled down on the handsome woman who still looked herself all but the white hair. I knew I needed a home—and yet—I didn't want one without you!

"I hadn't heard of Edward's death—Jack did not mention it in his letters when I returned from Germany three years ago. Nor did he speak of your children, only that you had three boys and a girl. You remember Gerald Hough? I returned to England visiting him at his father's home in Surrey. Their home was on The Solent; I spent six months there and aided him in the revision of his book.

"Then we went to Switzerland for a rest and his cousin, Madame Du Reau, was of our party.

"Perhaps my story will be tiresome?" he turned a face full of entreaty toward her. "I've waited twenty-five years for a word! It comes to-night without our seeking. When I registered my name I saw yours and knew at once who it was——"

"Go on Mr.—Dick!" Her voice trembled; a white, jeweled hand reached out—and then drew back!"

"You are free!" he cried hoarsely, "but I am not! I married Urseline Du Reau—to us was born a son—dead!

"But yesterday I left her in a private asylum for the insane. Dr. Joliet pronounces her a curable patient—I will have my wife again!

"She is beautiful, and pure, and true—I have tried to make her happy—and yet Annie, is it wrong to ask if you have kept any memory of Dick in your heart all these years?

"That you were a faithful wife and a good mother I know; you could not have been otherwise. You are a queen among women still! You were my soul's mate and I was yours! You have the boy to love and I have—your memory!"

Richard Cathcart groaned out the last words he would ever say to Annie Wallerand.

He was a proud, self-sustained, and virtuous man.

Her deep eyes shone with the old love! Her sweet, perfect mouth tried to frame an answer. The white, waving hair—so like a crown of shining silver, all at once leaned against his breast!

The years of his lost youth came back to him—he clasped her in his arms!

But why did she not respond? Must he plead in vain for one word?

"Annie!" He uplifted the dear face with a passionate entreaty. The chord of life had snapped—he looked into the face of the dead!

should have monopoly of the trade and territory in certain portions to the exclusion of other nations, and that this general partition should take place, each power having its own zone for future development and trade. On the contrary, the English and American nations have strenuously held out for the "open door" policy, which simply means that all nations are to have equal rights in every trading port in China. The latest nation to appear in this struggle is Italy, which demands the lease of Sam Mun Bay in the province of Che-Kiang as a coaling station and naval base. There has been very much friction between the Italians and the Tsung-Li-Yanen, which is the Chinese Foreign Affairs office. Under pretence of insult, the Italians have withdrawn from negotiations and are preparing for a naval demonstration and probable seizure of the part which they covet. The Chinese Government has refused all demands and is supported by Great Britain, notwithstanding that reports to the contrary have been published. It is said the British Government would like to have the United States and Japan join with it to proceed against the foreign nations in China, even to the point of making a display of force, and engaging in hostilities to compel Italy to entirely withdraw from China. The other powers desire America to take no hand, as it has been for a long time the plan of all European nations to isolate England and so counteract her great and growing strength.

So anxious is the German empire to have cordial relations with the United States that it is generally believed the German Emperor is making his plans to bring that empire into close alliance with England, America and Japan. Already the causes for irritation between the Americans and Germans are disappearing and Admiral Von Diedrichs, who has caused so much annoyance to Admiral Dewey, has been superseded by Prince Henry, the Emperor's brother, who will now have full command of the German naval forces in the East. Official newspapers in Germany are gradually working up the idea of the great Anglo-Saxon alliance, and placing the Germans as a Saxon nation. The general drift seems to be a withdrawal of Germany from its more southern neighbors, and it would seem that its vast and growing trade and manufacturing would naturally put it in league with the other great manufacturing countries. The most significant step in this direction has been the full withdrawal of Germany from the Philippines and placing her interests there in the hands of America.

One of the most noticeable things of the month has been the interview of Mr. Cecil Rhodes, who is in Europe negotiating for the great African railroad through the continent. Mr. Rhodes is a deep thinker and as Premier of Cape Colony has been practically the maker of South Africa and its wonderful prosperity. "It is the duty of civilized nations to take charge of barbarians and give them white man's government," he said. "The United States is one of the great Powers and cannot escape this duty." He declared that it would be found impossible for our country to abandon either Cuba or the Philippines. And further stated that within a century we should govern both North and South America. Mr Rhodes is an "expansionist" of the broadest sort; but his experience and the fact that he is the leading English colonist of his day have caused his interview to be studied in every European Capital and it has caused wide comment and concern. Whether any of us agree with him or not, it is well to note how carefully every modern statesman is watching the great Republic that has grown so marvelously great, rich and strong in so short a time, and how whether we wish it or not our very successes have placed us in a commanding position in the family of Nations.

Why "Tumblers."

PROBABLY it never occurred to many people to inquire why these glasses are called tumblers. Surely, they do not tumble any more than some other things not so named. But the name has a significant origin. Years ago, a luncheon was given to one of the royal Princesses, at Oxford, England. Of course the guests were supposed to converse on very weighty subjects. But what excited the interest and curiosity of the guests the most was a set of little round silver bowls about the size of an orange. They were brought round filled with ale brewed in the town. These were called tumblers, and the guests were shown why they were called so. When one of the little bowls was empty, it was placed upon the table mouth downward. So perfect was its balance, that instantly it flew back to its original position. No matter in what position it was placed—trundled along the floor, balanced upon its side, dropped suddenly upon the soft carpet—up it would roll, and giving itself a few little shakings, would settle itself into the same old position. So our tumblers were first made of silver, but as glass became common, round ones that would stand on a flat base took the place of the silver balls and also took the name.

The Tomb of the Holy Donkeys.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ONCE upon a time there was a great Sheikh Ali, a holy man, who kept the holy tomb of an ancient prophet. The tomb was on a hill, under a big oak tree, and the white dome could be seen for miles around. Lamps were kept burning day and night in the tomb, and if any one extinguished them they were miraculously lighted again. Men with sore eyes came to visit it and were cured. The earth around the tomb was carried off to be used as a medicine. Women came and tied old rags on the limbs of the tree, as vows to the wonderful prophet. Nobody knew the name of the prophet, but the tomb was called "Kobr en Nebi," or "Tomb of the Prophet." A green cloth was spread over the tomb under the dome, and incense was sold by the Sheikh to those who wished to heal their sick, or drive out evil spirits from their houses. Pilgrims came from afar to visit the holy place and its fame extended over all the land.

Sheikh Ali was becoming a rich man, and all the pilgrims kissed his hand and begged his blessing. Now Sheikh Ali had a faithful servant named Mohammed, who had served him long and well. But Mohammed was weary of living in one place, and asked permission to go and seek his fortune in distant parts. So Sheikh Ali gave him his blessing and presented him with a donkey, which he had for many years, that he might ride when tired of walking.

Then Mohammed, thus provided, set out on his journey. He went through cities and towns and villages, and at last came out on the mountains east of the Jordan in a desert place. No village or house was in sight, and night came on. Tired, hungry and discouraged poor Mohammed lay down by his donkey on a great pile of stones, and fell asleep. In the morning he awoke and, alas! his donkey was dead. He was in despair, but his kindly nature would not let the poor brute lie there to be devoured by jackals and vultures, so he piled a mound of stones over the body and sat down to weep.

While he was weeping a wealthy Hajji, or pilgrim, came along on his return from Mecca. He was surprised to see a man alone in this wilderness and asked him why he was weeping. Mohammed replied, "O Hajji, I have found the tomb of a holy prophet, and I have vowed to be its keeper; but I am in great need." The Hajji thanked him for the news, dismounted to visit the holy place and gave Mohammed a rich present. After he had gone Mohammed hastened to the nearest village and bought provisions and then returned to the holy prophet's tomb. The Hajji spread the news and pilgrims thronged to the spot with rich presents and offerings. As money came in Mohammed brought masons and built a costly tomb, with a tall white dome that could be seen across the Jordan. He lived in a little room by the tomb, and soon the miraculous lights began to appear in the tomb at night, which Mohammed had kindled when no one was near. He increased in fame and wealth and the prophet's tomb came to be regarded as one of the great shrines of the land.

At length Sheikh Ali heard of the fame of the new holy place in the desert, and as his own visitors began to fall off, decided to go himself and gain the merit of a visit to the tomb of that famous prophet. When he arrived there with his rich presents of green cloth, incense,

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

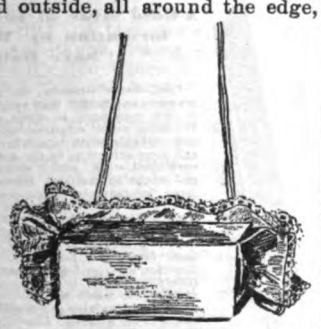
THERE have been a number of calls for directions for raising Chinese lilies. This is really very simple, if the bulbs are fresh when purchased. Use a regular Chinese lily earthenware dish, which is broad and open at the top and is decorated with Chinese figures, if possible, for these dishes seem so much more appropriate than anything else, and are very strong and not at all liable to breakage; if, however, you do not happen to have one, use a broad glass dish.

First put a few stones in the dish and then put in the bulbs; then put in more stones, loosely, so as to allow the roots to grow among them; fill the dish with water and do not change it, but add fresh every day, that is of about the same temperature as that already in the dish.

I have heard that the Chinese gash the bulbs in several places before placing them in the water, for it is said that a stalk will come out of every gash, and so there will be a fine foliage.

In growing bulbs of any kind, it is considered best to keep them in the dark for a few weeks after putting them into water, and so giving the roots a chance to get well started before the tops come out; sometimes it is well to keep them in the dark for a couple of weeks, and then bring them gradually into the bright light—that is, take them from their dark corner in the closet and put them in a dark corner of a room, away from the window, for another week; by that time the roots will have got an excellent start, and the dish may be put near the window—but it is well not to keep it too near, as a moderate light is better for lilies than the glaring sunlight.

We came across, recently, in a search for novelties, a dainty little bag or box, which might be used for several things, but which seems specially adaptable to holding embroidery, scissors, silk etc.



When closed this bag resembles an oblong box with ruffles at the ends—and when open it is simply flat and oblong in shape, with rounded ends. Our diagram shows the shape. For this is used silk of a delicate tint with little figures all over it, for the outside, and a plain China silk for a lining. The lining and outside are cut exactly alike, measuring seventeen inches wide by twenty inches long, with rounded corners. In the center, between the lining and outside, are placed five pieces of heavy cardboard, which form the top, bottom and sides of the box. Three of these pieces measure seven inches long by three and one-fourth inches wide, and one of these is laid exactly in the center, forming the bottom—the other two pieces of same size being laid on either side and close up to the first piece. These two pieces form the sides. The narrower pieces, but of the same length, seven inches long by two and one-eighth inches wide, are placed one at either side of the three already placed, and form the top of the box. A row of machine stitching goes entirely around all these pieces and so holds them exactly in place.

A delicate, narrow lace is inserted between the lining and outside, all around the edge, and stitched with the machine. Then a row of sixteen small brass rings is sewn around on the lining, as shown in our diagram, and through these rings is run a double row of narrow satin ribbon. When the ribbons are drawn up, one at each side, the box closes in perfect manner and shows a dainty receptacle like the picture entitled "Embroidery Box."

EMBROIDERY BOX.

This is a great improvement on the bag used by almost every woman for her embroidery materials, which is one with a circular cardboard bottom, and the upper part of silk, gathered onto this circle and drawn up with ribbon—for this box can be flattened out and the contents be looked over without taking anything out, or in any way disturbing the silks which so easily get tangled up.

There has recently come to the front, in large cities, a new branch of employment for women called "house-opening." The duties of such a woman are very trying, and only one with cast iron nerves should undertake them—but if she has executive ability and knows how, this is a fine chance for some women—notably those who have had fine homes of their own, but through misfortune have lost them—for they know exactly what to do. The idea is this: A lady who has been away for the summer wishes her home put in order before her arrival. She therefore writes to one of these house-openers, telling her the date of her arrival, and then her care in the matter ceases; not so the house-opener, however, for then her trouble begins; first she goes all over the house and sees just what is to be done, and then she seeks plumbers, painters, upholsterers, gas and electric men, and supervises each and all until finally, when the day arrives and with it Madame and her children and retinue of servants, the house is all in perfect order—even to the fresh flowers in all the rooms—for the home-coming. What a blessing this must be for those who can afford it—for who but a housewife realizes what it is to come home to a musty house that needs repairing and freshening before it can be lived in with any degree of comfort.

ONE—TWO—ONE.

BY E. S. L. T.

HE sat in the "madding crowd" at the great banquet. Fair women and brave men around and about him and yet he was all alone.

Success had come to this man now in his early forties—a large measure of fame, and power, and money. He had wed early. Too early in life for the ratification of his maturer judgment. The toy of Beauty, wherein dwelt no soul luster, had long since ceased to charm or inspire. He was hungry, heart and soul hungry, but none gave him bread! He was athirst but none gave him drink! His broad white brow bore across it lines of care. His mouth—what a fine, expressive feature it was, had about and around it the agony of compression and pain.

His fine blue eyes were sad almost to tears. He forced smiles to his lips and flashed wit and repartee at those around him. The laughter and the talk ceased as he rose to respond to a toast. All eyes were fixed upon him. Every word that fell from his lips was a jewel—a finished prose poem. He warmed to his theme. His face lit up with a sudden glow.

Now, he catches a gleam in another pair of eyes! Something in the soul which they voiced had responded to his soul! The eyes of a stranger—he had wondered who she was, the slight figure gowned in black—seemingly unattended at that scene of festivity.

Grey-brown eyes over which the lids fell as suddenly as they had been raised! The face; ah, it was sad or sadder than his own. He studied the face as he talked on.

"Who is she and why here?"

Already has his peace of mind been disturbed by that modest but earnest gaze. Such a listener as she is well worth the fire and eloquence with which he invests his theme! When the toasting and the feast is over there is the renewing of old acquaintances and the making of new ones. He misses part of her name when they are presented; it is——Graeme, but whether wife, maid, or widow he knows not.

Her low, sweet voice is tremulous and half afraid of its own sound. His own deep, musical baritone seems to swallow it as Death is swallowed up in victory! He notes that she is with his special friends Mr. and Mrs. Douglass Deleplane. He joins them on the gallery for a word with this plain woman. So plain that her more shining sisters wonder why the Deleplanes have brought her to this brilliant assemblage. He thinks of his dream as he watches her face light up, for he has joined the group; Mrs. Deleplane calls her "Hildegarde"; Ah, Swinburne's roudel sings itself anew to him as he stands there, an unwonted flush on his fine face!

"These many years since we began to be
What have the Gods done with us—what with me,
What with my love? They have shown me fates and fears
Harsh springs and fountains bitterer than the sea,
Grief a fixed star, and Joy a vane that veers
These many years."

He thought her eyes were beautiful. Those brown pupiled eyes with the changing shades of grey in them! He saw, too, that the soul of this woman was delicate and refined, that she was sensitive but not melancholy; sorrow had troubled her with its tumultuous breath, but it had sweetened and not embittered her nature. When Hildegarde Graeme talked the little group listened! The dull ache at this man's heart lost itself in the infectious charm and brilliance of her speech and thought, in the almost perfect ripeness of her intellect! She was beautiful, she was radiant, when her lips moved and her soul let go its thrall.

One short hour! He had lived a lifetime in it—a lifetime of happiness and joy! He knew the wish was wrong, the hope vain, that he might be with her forever. Would it be possible for him to smile over the adieux that would

The Century Plant.

A POPULAR error is derived from the prevalent notion that the Century Plant, botanically known as Agave Americana, blossoms but once in a hundred years. It is probable that this plant flowers but once in its lifetime and the period of flowering derives its peculiarity from the fact that its life is one of abnormal duration, such plants having been known to flower in their eightieth year. The particular specimen shown in our illustration is one of the Fourcroya which blossomed at its twenty-fifth year; its total height is thirty feet, and its leaves measure from six to seven feet in length.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

CONDUCTED BY COUSIN MARION.

An April greeting to you all, my dears, and may the glad sunshine of spring be in all your hearts. Now let us to business, for there are many of you to talk to individually.

The first from your big pile of letters is from Cousin Julia B., away down at Skidmore, Texas, who wants to know the address of Miss Helen Gould. I fancy a letter addressed to her at New York City would reach her, but I may tell Cousin Julia, that it is needless to ask any favors of Miss Gould as she has more to do now than forty young women could attend to.

Anna, Farmington, Mo.—Write to the Postmaster, Paterson, N. J., for the addresses of silk manufacturers in that town, and from them you can learn what you want to know.

Sallye and Annye, Allington, Texas.—The young man who is secretly engaged to two girls is neither true nor manly, and both of them should inform him of it and have no more to do with him. Thank you very much, Cousin Sallye, for the sweet little poem.

Genevieve, New York City.—Have a little talk with the young man who insists on paying your car fare every evening home, and let him know how you feel about it. He is all right, I should say, if you let him understand your position. Of course he has no right to annoy you with his attentions.

Cousin Marie, of Austin, Ills.—Will send the language of stamps to any of the cousins wanting it. I think the national flower question has been answered.

L. L. S., DeMossville, Ky.—Write to The John Church Company, Cincinnati.

Sarah H., Basin Spring, Texas.—It is quite proper for a Presbyterian preacher to marry a Baptist girl if she will have him. (2) It is just as well not to wear a young man's ring. (3) It is correct enough to accept costly presents from a rich brother-in-law. (4) Yes, an eighteen-year-old girl ought to know whether she loves a man or not. (5) The man must never take the woman's arm in walking.

Ida and Jennie, Concordia, Mo.—Let the young man who loves your sister follow his love. (2) Yes, ask the man who calls on you to call again, if you want him to come. (3) Don't trust the young man who tells you he loves you the first time he meets you.

Daisy, Bayonet, Ga.—(1) Ask your music teacher. (2) Wear your hair in the style most becoming to you, with some reference to prevailing fashion. (3) Don't ask the young man to come in when the family has retired. In the country it is not usual to accommodate a caller over night. (4) Don't address a young man as "My dear William" unless he is kin or your sweetheart. Oh, yes, a girl can very properly pin a bouquet on a young man's coat. But make him keep his distance.

Edith, Kilbourne, Ohio.—I should say girls of fourteen should not go to dances.

Blue Eyes, Johnstown, Pa.—You did perfectly right in resenting the attentions of the married man. He is a scoundrel to be shunned.

Blue Eyes, Springdale, Mo.—Your escort's duty at a dance or elsewhere is to you.

Lilac and Rose, Columbus, Ga.—Tell the young man once or twice how fond you are of opal rings. He will understand unless he is too stupid for any use. (2) It is silly to talk about winning a man's love, and sillier to marry a man thirty years older than you. (3) Better have a chaperone when riding twelve miles at night.

Ruth and Ruby, Grantville, Cal.—Ask the gentleman to lay his hat aside, or take it, just as you please.—(2) A gentleman always tips his hat to a lady. (3) Always present the gentleman to the lady. (4) Yes, you may "keep company" with one young man and write to another, but don't say "keep company." (5) A young lady of thirty-one may receive the attentions of a man of fifty. (6) In the absence of your "best young man" you may accept the company of another to a dance.

S. Crow, Spring Ranche, Neb.—A young lady should not be "affectionate in company."

Margaret, Manitowoc, Wis.—Harper & Brothers, New York, Golden Days, Philadelphia, and Youths' Companion, Boston. (2) There are no lady detectives, popular in society. (3) A man engaged should be as loyal to his fiancee as if she were his wife. If he isn't she had better not marry him.

Little Rosebud, Modoc, Ills.—Don't marry the rich man because he is rich, nor the poor one because he is poor. Marry the man you love, if you can get him.

Violet Rose, Chicago, Ills.—Do not marry the young man if you feel ashamed of him. Wait a year and see if your mind doesn't change. (2) It is right for a good girl to take care of the wages of the young man she intends to marry. (3) A core maker is a very good trade in good times. (4) June and October are the popular marrying months. (5) Kissing games are no longer fashionable.

B. C., Monette, S. C.—My advice to you is not to attempt story writing until you have read a great many.

Sunbeam, Paducah, Ky.—It is usual for engaged couples to exchange rings.

Laura and Gertrude, Plattsburg, Mo.—It is positively wrong for you to do what your mothers object to.

Alpha, White Pine, Tenn.—The young king of Spain is about fourteen now. (2) Sometimes advertisers furnish their own cuts and sometimes the publisher does. It depends upon contracts.

American Girl, Springfield, Ohio.—There is no call for nurses in the army unless they are trained to some extent. Write to Miss Clara Barton, Washington.

M. C., Plaquemine, La.—Wear a dress to your shoe tops, of almost any color except glaring colors. (2) The young man may give his photograph without being asked for it.

Kate and Helen, Sharpsburg, Pa.—It is very common and vulgar to talk to young men without an introduction to them, except under circumstances that will excuse it. (2) There is nothing to prevent tanning except to keep out of the sun. Any druggist will give you a formula to remove tan.

Two Cousins, Island Lake, N. D.—You can make your "beaus" respect you by being at all times lady-like and dignified. (2) You can reduce stoutness by dieting, but you should consult a physician. (3) Private dances are not at all improper if only proper people are invited. It is better, perhaps, if young girls did not dance the round dances.

M. M., Hazelton, Pa.—Fifteen-year-old girls should not go bicycling with young men. Fifteen-year-old girls should think of something else besides "beaus."

Two Girls, Collinsville, Ills.—It is the lady's place to speak first in meeting a gentleman on the street. (2) In answer to your other questions, let me say that first of all girls should be ladies. If they are they will not need to be asking about kissing and hugging.

Bess, Maudin, H. S.—Ask your druggist. Any black mixture that hasn't acid or grease in it would answer. Have the waist of the costume made loose; it is classic that way.

Queenie, Lee, N. D.—A man may give his affianced a watch very properly. (2) Girls of seventeen are practically women, but they should still be largely governed by their parents in the matter of choosing friends. Do not be in a hurry to marry.

Sorrow, Rosendale, Mo.—Refuse to see the young man again and keep on refusing for one year. If he is still asking for you then, see him and tell him what you think of him. Men are deceivers ever.

Nora Brown, Ovilla, Texas.—Send the sixteen-year-old boy home to his mother.

Pansy, Acorn Ridge, Mo.—A cake-walk is an extravagant style of walking for exhibition purposes, and is so-called because a cake is the prize.

Daisy, Schulenburg, Texas.—It is perfectly proper for a girl to sing in her own house, but some say that a girl should never whistle. Why she should not I am unable to state.

Pansy, Lamoni, Iowa.—Ordinarily a girl might be more safely guided by her brother's advice as to a young man than by any other's. Most brothers think a great deal of their sisters.

Violet, Valatie, N. Y.—A girl that means right never flirts with "show fellows" or any other kind. You are old enough to know what is right.

Brownie, Ilion, N. Y.—Don't worry about the young man. He will come around all right, and if he doesn't, it won't make much difference. He has no right to "get mad."

Now, dears, I must say au revoir, and meet you all again in May. Some of you who have not been answered over your own signatures will find answers to your questions in the answers to the others, for, bless your hearts, very many of you want to know about just the same thing. The world may be big, but men and women are the same all over. By by, till May. COUSIN MARION.

ONE—TWO—ONE.

come so soon? Was this the personality of his dream seen in a "guise of angelhood," leading him out of a dark place into daisied meadows and running brooks?

This was she—Hildegarde Graeme.

* * * * * * *

A month later he saw her again. A tall, heavy, florid, sensual looking piece of humanity stood with her while their baggage was being transferred to an outbound steamer. He had gone down to say good-by to the Deleplanes not knowing that the Graemes were of the party. The electricity of thought quickened his pulse; he was in a new world in her presence. He felt his blood stir as it had never stirred before! Her ease of pose, her technique of movement, the inspiration of her eyes, her voice, appealed to him with masterful force. How he hated that man—her husband! The shame, the pity of it all, that she should have made such a sacrifice! Was this man or beast to whom she was tied with iron bonds? Deleplane had told him the story and a long one. The ward of a designing uncle, while yet but half blossomed into womanhood, she had been sold—to the highest bidder!

As the helpless victim of her uncle's treachery she had borne all in silence. The pain, the disgust, the outrage to all her finer feelings had left unhealing scars, but she hid them, and in heroic guise met the claims of life.

One had struck a sympathetic chord in her breast with the "rich melody of his matchless voice," but his path could only touch hers as the wind kisses the rose, and then passes on!

No opthalmoscope were needed to examine the optic nerve and retina of—this misapprehension—her husband!

A charcoal burner in Central Mexico might easily have been more of a man than Dorson Graeme. Ah, indeed! Civilization was a word of somewhat uncertain meaning. This was another act in the tragedy of his life—the man whose silent shadow would follow Hildegarde Graeme forever!

Vernon Bernhall repressed the thrilling passion that he felt. He, too, had a cross to bear, and he must bear it manfully. Bear it as he had been bearing it, in stoical silence.

"I can but be a better man for having known her. I can subordinate myself better to duty for that knowing. To the touch of her hand the tiger in me might become a dove! Good-by, little one, in all the years to come you will rest upon my heart!"

No sound escaped his stern set lips, as with a formal bow he turned away.

Hildegarde's voice spoke thus:

"I, by knowing him, have strength for all my future life! I will no longer groan under the 'wearisome burden of this earthly existence'. To know that he lives—" her thoughts were wafted back to the swift, receding shores of her native land.

Two they had been in the atoms of the universe—they were One now—one for all eternity! What did the formal farewell matter! No longer was an unstilled thirst upon her—reaching out through the azured distances soul would hold its daily communion with soul despite the cruel severing of an inevitable fate!

AN industry in the gold trade which employs a large number of hands with no small amount of skill, is the beating of innumerable little square pieces of gold which are used to cover domes, signs, etc. The gold is received in bars an eighth of an inch thick, an inch wide and weighing 240 pennyweights. This is rolled into a ribbon 30 yards long. It is given to the workmen in strips of 7 yards—each of which is cut into 180 pieces. These pieces, protected by fine skins, are placed in a clutch and pounded—the gold as it spreads out being sub-divided until it is of the exact dimensions required. It is beaten down to 200,000th of an inch, and is then rubbed with brine before being placed in skins, so it will not adhere to them. The workmen must know exactly how hard the blows of the hammer must be, and the exact spot they must fall—and although it appears to be easy work, it is in reality an art of a very delicate description.

"OLD GLORY."

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE origin of "Old Glory" is possibly not known to all the readers of COMFORT, and they may be glad to see a brief sketch as to how it came into existence.

The Continental Congress appointed a committee to prepare a national standard, and this committee visited General Washington, then at Cambridge, Mass., where a design was adopted by them which consisted of thirteen red and white stripes to represent the thirteen States, with the Cross of St. George in the upper staff corner. A little later a blue field with thirteen stars was used with the original red and white stripes, and a flag of this description was adopted by Congress on June 14th, 1777. The same design is still used—but with the admission of each new State to the Union another star has been added to the original thirteen, on the 4th of July following its admission. There are now, therefore, forty-five stars, and long may they wave!

"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all like it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.

The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1040 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It will our lamps, and turns night into day." Every home, store, hotel, saloon, hall, church, or car company will buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

Medium or A wick, 5-8 inch wide—the size for house lamps—by mail, sample 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Small or E wicks, for hand lamps, lanterns, etc., 3-8 inch wide, sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents per gross, $2.50. Large or B wicks, for table, hall, store, or bracket lamps, 1 inch wide, sample, 5 cents. per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $3.50. Dwick, 11-2 inches wide, for incubators, hall, bracket, or store lamps, sample, 8 cents; 33 cents dozen; $3.50 gross. Argand wicks for parlor lamps, sample, 15 cents; per gross, $3.50. On all orders for $10.00 accompanied by the cash, 15 per cent. off. Send for sample dozen, giving width desired, and see how they go. We can supply you with any style ARC-LIGHT WICK in any quantities, from a single wick to a thousand dozen.

HA! HA! HA! FUN ALIVE!

The Comical Mirror.

A handsome convex mirror in a case suitable for carrying in the pocket. For many years the funniest and most laughable attraction in nearly every museum has been the large convex mirrors in which a person appears drawn out as long and narrow as a bean pole, or flattened down like a gridiron with a face as broad as a cellar door. This mirror produces the same effect as the large and expensive mirrors in the museums.

By holding the mirror in an upright position stout people look thin and in a horizontal position thin people look stout: anyone can recognize themselves at once, but their features are so distorted and their general appearance so changed that they cannot fail to have a good laugh over it. If you have a friend (lady or gentleman) who think they are a little better looking than anyone else, let them take a peep into the mirror and it will take them down a peg or two—either the "short and fat" view or the "long and slim" view are stunners and will cure the blues every time. Send for one it will afford you lots of fun.

GRAND OFFER TO YOU. Send us 12 cents and we will send this splendid literary monthly for the Home, three whole months on a trial subscription and one Comical Mirror, postpaid; for 27 cents we will send you the paper 3 months and three mirrors all paid; or, for only 76 cents we will send the paper a whole year and one dozen mirrors by express. IDEAS FROM A CORN-GERM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THAT so simple a thing as a grain of corn should inspire discovery seems surprising, and yet it is a fact that several very recent inventions of the greatest importance depend upon it for their usefulness. One of these is an artificial india-rubber, which is so admirable a substitute that before long it will certainly take the place of the real article to a large extent in a commercial way. It is a horny, elastic body, with many of the properties of caoutchouc.

This remarkable counterfeit of india-rubber is produced by combining corn oil with sulphur. Corn oil, be it understood, is obtained from the corn germ, which represents the vegetative element of the seed. Examined with the eye of science, a corn kernel is a tiny treasure-casket, from which the conjurer Nature hands out an astonishing number of choice gifts to man. As a matter of simple fact, more than a hundred distinct and separate commercial articles are now obtained from this source, one association of factories in this country alone producing fifty-seven.

Up to the present time the oil from corn germ has been regarded as unfit for food, because of a peculiar rancid flavor, but this difficulty has been got rid of by a company in Vienna, which is buying large quantities of corn oil from the United States and shipping it back to this country as "pure olive." In truth, it is a fairly good substitute for the latter, and makes a very acceptable oil for table use and for cooking. This is really a very important discovery, inasmuch as the difficulty hitherto has been to find ways for utilizing the immense quantities of corn oil which are turned out as a by-product of starch and glucose factories. Corn oil will now become an important rival of cottonseed oil, of which 50,000,000 pounds were consumed in the United States last year. None of the prejudice existing against cottonseed oil as food will be felt in regard to corn oil, derived as the latter is from a familiar vegetable; and, unlike the cottonseed product, it is digestible.

What led originally to all these discoveries respecting corn oil was the ascertainment of the fact that the frequent spoiling of shipments of corn meal and hominy was due to the oil in the germs, which turned rancid. So now this mischief is prevented by "degerminating" the grain before the latter is subjected to processes of manufacture. A most ingenious machine has been devised recently, by which the germ of each kernel is clipped out by a separate movement of one of a series of instruments provided for the purpose, and yet the work is done with such rapidity as to make it profitable.

A corn-kernel is a little box of starch, the grains of which are so beautifully packed that, when seen under the microscope, they have an appearance resembling a crystalline structure. These grains are the baby food of the embryo plant, which is represented by a "germ" that takes the place of a prize in the package. As a matter of fact, this "germ" is itself merely an oily and highly nutritious envelope for the actual microscopic rudiment of life which it contains. The outer coat of the kernel, or box proper, is of woody material and very hard, for the protection of the precious contents.

The contents of the little box are the source of practically all the starch made and used in the United States for table and laundry purposes. A third employment for this starch, of a commercial importance realized by few, is for the sizing of papers, including writing-papers and wall-papers. There are half a dozen different qualities of starches, the finest, of course, being employed for the table and furnishing material for puddings, custards, the cheaper grades of ice-cream, etc. Baking-powders, too, are composed chiefly of corn starch. Practically all the gum-arabic produced in this country is obtained from corn starch. This product is sold mainly to confectioners, who make from it various kinds of gummy candies, such as marshmallows.

When one licks a postage stamp, he is not apt to give thanks to a corn kernel for saving him labor; yet he might reasonably do so. The mucilage on all postage stamps, as well as on all letter envelopes, is dextrine derived from corn—a gum particularly suitable for this sort of use, being very adhesive and soluble in water. Glucose, by the way, is another substance utilized in immense quantities by confectioners and brewers, and all of it is derived from the corn kernel.

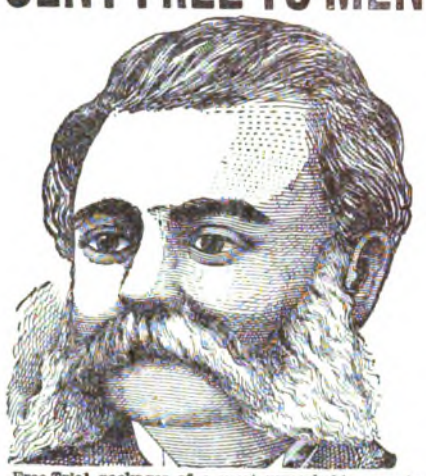
Take a kernel of corn, plant it in the ground and soon the little conjuring box opens of its own accord and yields a number of other products useful to man. The leaves of the grown plant are excellent cattle food, and so are the cobs, when ground to meal. The cobs are utilized also as fuel, three tons of them being reckoned as equal to one ton of hard coal. As for the pith of the stock, it is quite a remarkable substance, being so bibulous as to absorb twenty-five times its own weight of water. This pith has been employed with the greatest success in the construction of American battleships, compressed blocks of it being placed between two walls of armor. When the latter is pierced by a projectile and water enters, the corn pith absorbs the water, instantly swelling up and filling the hole. Corn pith also is used in the manufacture of varnishes, and for making smokeless powder and an excellent substitute for gun-cotton. Indian corn is the source of most of the whiskey and of practically all the alcohol and "cologne spirits" produced in this country.

Before long corn leaves will be used in immense quantities for making paper. They are already employed for this purpose in Vienna, being soaked preliminarily in hot water for some days, after which they are easily separated into three parts—the large veins and ribs, the material between the ribs, and a coarse, pasty stuff. The first are utilized for manufacturing gunny sacks, cordage and certain kinds of cloth; the second furnishes material for a peculiar sort of bread, and the third serves for paper pulp.

It ought to be mentioned in conclusion that corn oil is most valuable for lubricating, for mixing paints, for illumination and for making soaps. The "cake" left over after the oil has been expressed from the germs, supplies a valuable cattle food, rich in meat-forming substances.

Chang Wee's Novel Home.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



ONE of the oddities of Oakland, California, is a Chinaman named Chang Wee, who makes his living repairing chairs. He is a skillful and industrious workman, makes good wages, and is in a fair way to be a wealthy man. He already owns a lot, in partnership with another Chinese, on East Fourteenth street; but he considers himself too poor to build, or even to keep house, and avoids a tax collector as a deadly enemy to the prudent saver of money. He walks through Alameda and Contra Costa counties following his trade, and spends his time, when not on the road, in a rocking chair. He carries about on his back, as a sample of his work, a large, old-fashioned rocking chair, and uses it, besides, as dining-room, bedroom and kitchen. At mealtimes he is to be seen seated in his chair by the side of the road devouring his rice and prunes, and at night he huddles up in it to sleep.

The authorities objected to his occupying the streets as a resting place at night unless he showed a light, as the law is explicit on the point that obstructions to the public roads shall be illuminated after dark; so Chang procured a lantern and now hangs it, lighted, to the back of his chair when he retires for the night.

Among the Chinese of Oakland Chang Wee is looked upon with suspicion, and his ways are considered as absurd and inconsistent; but little does he care, and he pursues his wandering way unmindful of the scorn of his countrymen.

The leaning tower of Pisa is two hundred and two feet high or eighteen feet shorter than Bunker Hill monument.

SENT FREE TO MEN

Free Trial packages of a most remarkable remedy for sexual weakness are being distributed by the State Medical Institute. They cured so many men who had battled for years against the mental and physical suffering of lost manhood that the Institute has decided to distribute free trial packages to all who write. It is a home treatment and all men who suffer with any form of sexual weakness resulting from youthful folly, premature loss of strength and memory, weak back or varicocele, can now cure themselves at home.

The remedy has a peculiarly grateful effect of warmth and seems to act direct to the desired location, giving strength and development just where it is needed. It cures all the ills and troubles that comes from years of misuse of the natural functions and has been an absolute success in all cases. A request to the State Medical Institute, 558 First National Bank Building, Ft. Wayne, Ind., stating that you desire one of their free trial packages, will be complied with. The Institute is desirous of reaching that great class of men who are unable to leave home to be treated, and the free trial package will enable men to see how easy it is to be cured when the proper remedies are employed. THREE HUNDRED PER CENT. PROFIT. A MONEY MAKER FOR AGENTS.

The ordinary store keeper can feel proud when he makes twenty per cent. on sales; but when you handle the Magical Sponge, which you will notice advertised in another column of this paper, you cannot make less than one hundred per cent. and can easily clear three hundred per cent. profit. It is the neatest and greatest seller ever seen and sells itself. Just look at a few orders within a few days and see how it goes. These are not selected orders, but a few picked out of the heap, all haphazard, just to give you an idea and encourage you in taking hold and winning your fortune. Here was Joshua Crosby, East Weymouth, Mass., ordered a gross, February 23rd, and on the 12th of March ordered another. That's nearly $52.00 clear (simply paid Exp. charges out of it), just for a little work done at odd times in a few days. Mrs. J. Cartwel, Milford, Ill., on April 2nd sent for 6 dozen and on the 7th sent for a whole gross. There's thirty-nine dollars cleared up in a few days. Almon L. Reed, Benton Station, Maine, sold a dozen. Annie T. Silvey, Stevensville, Mont., ordered five dozen in less than a month. Mrs. John Abbott, Georgiaville, R. I., had 3 dozen sent her March 19th, and on April 3rd had a whole gross. A. E. Bryson, Oakdale, Pa., a dozen one day and right after 3 dozen, and so on through a whole pile of correspondence and orders, all telling how easy it is to sell the Magical Sponge, and how anxious people are to get it when they see what it will do. Many agents after showing the work of the sponge, easily sell from 3 to one dozen sponges in an office, or a building, while it is no trouble to sell them on the street, in shops, factories and houses as fast as you can handle them. Remember that every sale means large profit and never less than one hundred per cent. clear, which just doubles your money, while you can with a little energy and push, make six dollars on every dollar invested. You will notice we give you a sample to start you if you send for a subscription to "COMFORT" to-day.

A Nation of Oat-Eaters.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

"WE ARE getting to be a nation of oat-eaters," said Secretary of Agriculture James Wilson a day or two ago. "One of the most difficult things in the world is to persuade a people to adopt a new kind of food. That is the trouble with the introduction of our Indian corn in Europe, where maize is considered only good for beasts. In the same way, we Americans regarded oats as fit only for horses up to thirty odd years ago.

"During the period of the Civil War rice became very scarce, owing to interference with its production in the South. It so happened that a young Scotchman in this country took a notion that this shortage in the cereal crop might be compensated for by introducing oats as human fare. In Scotland, of course, oatmeal is a national dish, and this hard-headed person made up his mind that what was good for Scotchmen ought to be good for Americans. Accordingly he obtained control of a small mill in Ohio, and converted it into a mill to make oatmeal.

"This was the beginning of what has since grown to be an immense industry—namely, the manufacture of oatmeal. Of course, the new food acquired popularity very slowly, but it grew steadily in the appreciation of the people, and wise physicians, recognizing its extraordinary excellence as a diet, began to recommend it, particularly for children. Thus the production kept on increasing until in 1888 we exported 4,329,292 pounds of oatmeal. In 1896 we exported 47,310,251 pounds. That seems wonderful, does it not? Let me surprise you, then, still more by the information that in 1898 this country exported 85,500,270 pounds of oatmeal!

"There you have almost a doubling of the export in a twelvemonth. If you go back to 1884, you will find that we actually imported 1,195,948 pounds of oatmeal. About two-thirds of all the oatmeal now produced in the United States goes to Great Britain and one-fifth is bought from us by the Netherlands. I have not the figures in detail for 1898, but in 1897 we shipped 33,047,702 pounds of oatmeal to Great Britain, 9,873,138 pounds to the Netherlands, 2,891,132 pounds to Germany, 174,125 pounds to Austro-Hungary, 124,240 pounds to Denmark, 145,500 pounds to Norway and Sweden, 83,750 pounds to Belgium, 62,750 pounds to Italy and 21,560 pounds to Russia.

"The amazing growth of the popularity of oats as human food in this country is due to an increasing familiarity with its value in the diet. It contains a very large proportion of the substance that makes muscle and blood. This substance we call nitrogenous matter. You may consider any kind of cereal as being made up of nitrogenous matter and carbonaceous matter, the latter being a fuel or heat maker. In wheat flour the nitrogenous matter is to the carbonaceous matter as 1 is to 6 1-2; in oats it is 1 to 7; in barley and rye it is 1 to 8 1-2; in Indian corn it is1 to 10. All you have to do is to look at these figures, in order to ascertain the comparative values of the different grains as food.

"Wheat, you see, comes first, having the largest proportion of muscle-forming substance. Oats, however, are next to wheat in this respect, and very close up. A laboring man can do a day's work on oats and nothing else; they furnish him with all that his body requires in the way of fuel and repair of tissue. He can do the same thing on wheat bread, and the soldier in the ranks, no matter how much he may grumble about hardtack, can fight his best on that diet. Hardtack, of course, is composed of flour and water simply.

"A great deal has been said lately as to enlarging the market abroad for cornmeal. If this can be accomplished, it will be of great advantage to the United States, inasmuch as we produce about 2,000,000,000 bushels of Indian corn annually. This cereal is readily transformed into meats, dairy products, starch, glucose, high wines, and various other marketable articles. It is the cheapest raw material produced by the farmer. However, the percentage of muscle-forming matter which it contains is low and therefore it cannot suitably replace grains that are richer in nitrogen. The laborer of Europe who can afford to have only one kind of grain on his table is able to work all day on barley-bread, black rye bread, oat cake, or oat porridge; but he cannot accomplish the same results with cornmeal alone.

"On the other hand, the well-to-do European who can afford to put on his table meats, fish or cheese, to supply the requisite nitrogen, finds the American corn-bread a valuable addition to his diet. He does so, that is to say, if he can be induced to relinquish his prejudice against maize. This indicates the direction in which we should try to push our Indian corn abroad. We should try to introduce it not among the laboring classes, but among the well-to-do.

"The lack of nitrogen in corn is illustrated by the fact that while you can fatten a steer on maize after he has attained his growth, you cannot grow the young animal on corn. A cow will give plenty of milk when fed on oats, barley, rye, or wheat, but if you give her corn only, she will stop yielding milk and will promptly fatten.

"Oats are destined to become steadily more popular in this country as food for human beings. As I have said, we are becoming a nation of oat-eaters. It is a good sign and promises well for the future of the country and its people."

Silk from Spiders.

AT a certain ball in South Africa not very long ago, the hostess wore a dress made of spider's silk. More than a hundred years ago, a French scientist made an attempt to utilize the silk spun by a spider, and since then several experiments have been made in that line. One man succeeded in having a pair of socks and a pair of mittens made from the silk. These articles were carefully examined and pronounced genuine, but as reported, "the game was hardly worth the candle." It took ninety spider threads to equal one silk thread in strength, and one hundred and eighty to make a thread strong enough to sew with. It takes twice as many spiders as silk worms to make a given amount of silk and it would have taken twenty-eight thousand cocoons to make one pound of silk. An English manufacturer obtained some large tropical spiders and kept them in a warm room into which he caused a liquid composed of chloroform, ether and alcohol to evaporate. The result was satisfactory in regard to the production of the silk, but as it brought the cost of the silk up to one hundred and fifty dollars a pound, it didn't seem to be favorable to the manufacture of silk for dresses.

The reflection from a flash of lightning travels nearly two million times faster than the sound of the report.

Russia is a huge farm, comprising one-seventh of the land surface of the globe, and one-twenty-sixth of its total area.

The first newspaper published in America was the Boston News Letter, established in 1704. It was a half sheet of paper, twelve inches by eight, with two columns on a page. It lived seventy-two years.

George Washington after his first retirement in 1783, became convinced of the defective nature of the working animals employed in the agriculture of the Southern States. He set about remedying the difficulty by introducing mules to be used instead of horses. The King of Spain sent him some mules from the royal stables in Madrid, and Washington set about breeding these animals. This is practically the origin of the mule in the United States.

CONSTIPATION

"I have gone 14 days at a time without a movement of the bowels, not being able to move them except by using hot water injections. Chronic constipation for seven years placed me in this terrible condition; during that time I did everything I heard of but never found any relief; such was my case until I began using CASCARETS. I now have from one to three passages a day, and if I was rich I would give $100.00 for each movement; it is such a relief." AYLMER L. HUNT, 1689 Russell St., Detroit, Mich.

How to Cure Rupture.

(Copyrighted.)

It gives us pleasure and satisfaction to write these words of hope to the ruptured. Not what caused but what will cure your rupture is what we wish to write about. The most common are, Ventral, Scrotal, Umbilical, and Femoral. If rupture can be returned to natural position it is called reducible; if not, it is irreducible. This last is caused by wearing a poor truss, or going without one. Don't deceive yourself by saying, my rupture is small, no need of my reading this. Death from strangulation of Hernia comes in nearly every case from small ruptures. No others so dangerous, no other the cause of so many painful surgical operations. Nothing else causes a man to walk day by day so near death. It allows one intestine to come down; this causes strangulation from the great pressure required to move its contents. You have suffered for years, tried every device, spent many dollars—the result has been failure.

The old style truss is now gone forever, except in a few cases where some one has a lot on hand, and persuades a sufferer to buy one who does not know the difference. When the elastics were introduced, many exclaimed here is at last a perfect trnss, but disappointment followed, because all dependence was placed in elastic webbing or belts. You know that elastic soon rots; then, if proper care is given, the belt must be readjusted every day; it can never be two days alike. How can that cure? It is a waste of space to tell you about old style elastic or spring trusses, or how you have suffered; belts and straps pulled so tight that many say, I would rather die than stand the torture. So they risk their lives and live in misery without a truss.

To Effect a Cure all know that the rupture must be held easy, comfortable, natural, the same as if no rupture existed. That is what our appliance does. It is our great good fortune to have a truss; to compare it with others would be like comparing an electric light with a tallow candle. Not an instrument of torture with ropes, pulleys, elastics, etc., but a new idea that has been proven to be far ahead of any known appliance. A wonderful invention, and a blessing to mankind.

It cures because it holds everything in a natural position, giving nature a chance to repair the damage that has been done. Nature heals a broken bone, or bruise, or cut, if given the right chance; so it will a rupture. The inventor of this truss is Rev. J. Hayden, chaplain of the 17th Maine regiment, who is well remembered by those who wore the blue and the gray for his many acts of kindness. This is what he says:—"Finding myself ruptured, I sought advice of an older brother, who had the same trouble. He said, 'I have been ruptured for forty years, and have spent over $300 for trusses, and the one I have now is the best I ever had; it cost me $15 (it was an elastic truss), but it is breaking, and I must get another." On examination, I found an elastic strap around him, with every stitch of the webbing printed on his body, while the understrap that passed between his legs had chafed him so that he was red and sore. This led me to discover my truss, which is as easy to wear as a stocking, and which ended all pain, danger, and cost. It never needs repairing. I want to get it into the hands of my fellow men who are suffering from this dangerous and painful infirmity, for I know it will be worth a hundred times its cost. I am broken down with kidney and heart disease, and I am in constant expectation of death. The thought has been constantly before me. An invention which has the power to relieve so much suffering should not be buried with me. As I am not able, I want you to take measures to introduce it to the world; and if this is accomplished, I shall feel my life has been of value to sufferers. As I have reflected on the miseries of millions without means of relief, and the dismal certainty of their growing worse, and consider that I have in my keeping a comfortable, sure-fitting, never-failing remedy, amply proven and tested in my own and other cases, and which, at a glance, common sense will appreciate, I feel that it would be a giant wrong to mankind to have this invention buried with me: for, as I value my honor in this world, and my soul in the next, I unhesitatingly declare that I regard a failure in any instance as impossible."

Our Terms: No Cure, no Pay. Perfectly confident of our curing warrants us to adopt the above terms; it is fair and honest. We know from actual experience that many people always write for something they can get for nothing. Many write who are not ruptured; they want, for nothing, something they can sell to some afflicted person for $10 or $15; while others have no gratitude in them, and never repay a favor. To keep such parties from bothering us we decided on this plan: Send us $1 for single or $2 for double, to be held by us as a small guarantee of good faith; we then send you a truss to be worn by you, but the truss is ours, and we only lend it. When you are cured you are to promptly send us back the truss and $4. Many who get cured say, we want to keep the truss. To all we reply, we will sell it to you at a fair price, the charge being according to the work done, and we will not exceed $10. It takes from sixty days to six months to cure. The terms are fair, and we will not deviate from them.

You can be Cured Free. Send us with your order the names of all the ruptured people you know; when we send our truss to six of them we will refund your $1 and give you the truss. We will not, without your permission, tell who sent us the names, or as you will know it to be all we claim, you can, truthfully recommend it. There will be no doubt of your getting six orders. You can send the amount of money less the $1 you have paid us, and thus get yours free.

What We Claim. A truss that cures, worn day and night, needs no changing, no matter what your position is, you do the hardest work the same as if you had no rupture. Easy as a stocking. For simplicity, comfort, durability, and effectiveness cannot be equalled. Cool and comfortable in warm weather. No parts to chafe, no understraps, nothing to absorb foul odor from the body, always in place, always comfortable, always healing. Will last a hundred years. Our truss is for men, women, children, and infants, and fits all kinds of ruptures. Fleshy people will find a great relief. No hot bands around you. The only truss that women and infants can wear and be easy and cleanly.

Will you, after reading these few plain and truthful statements, continue in misery with a poor truss, or risk your life by going without? Dare you lay this aside without giving it a trial, which costs you nothing? Do you think it like humbug advertisements you have seen? If so, write to the postmaster, the bankers, any business man, or city official. We own and occupy one of the largest blocks in this city.

Men, women, and children use the same measure blanks. The U. S. Government allowed Rev. J. Hayden a patent, No. 400,454. Is not that alone sufficient proof that it is a wonderful invention? Send for book of testimonials or circulars. We have cured many, we can cure you if you will let us. It costs a great many dollars for each line of this ad. each time it appears, so we have to be brief as possible. We could fill this whole paper with testimonials. Here are a few:

The Postmaster says: "I have examined the letters from which these testimonials were taken, and guarantee the same to be genuine. I was also shown a great many other testimonials which speak in the highest terms of the Surehold truss." E. T. MAYBERRY.

"Westbrook, Me. This is to certify that I am personally acquainted with Mr. Alexander Speirs, and consider him responsible for any contracts he may make, and strictly reliable." KING S. RAYMOND, Mayor.

"Westbrook, Me. This is to certify that Mr. Alexander Speirs is a large real estate holder in this city, and is considered responsible for any contracts he may make." WILLIAM M. LAMB, City Clerk.

"Westbrook, Me. This is to certify that I am personally acquainted with Mr. Alexander Speirs, and consider him perfectly responsible. He owns and occupies the block shown in the picture, one of the largest in the city." RUSSELL D. WOODMAN, Treas. Westbrook Bank.

Suffered 16 Years. Now Cured. "Dear Sirs: Accept my many thanks. I think your truss is the only one that is sure cure. I consider myself cured by your truss after suffering for sixteen years, trying many different kinds." J. S. POTTER, Atlanta, Ga.

Saved from the Knife. "I had used every kind of a truss I could get hold of, and found none that would hold rupture in place, it being very low down, and the doctors told me that I could get help only by an operation, and which I had decided to have performed. I suffered so much from it, and had gone so far as to make arrangements with parties to perform the operation, when I happened by chance to get hold of one of your books. I looked it over and decided to try once more, and sent you my measure for a truss, which was received in due time. I put it on and it fitted like a charm, and has held me all right, and rupture has not been down since I put it on. I wear it all the time without any inconvenience. I should hardly know I had a truss on without I think of it. I can sleep or bend in any manner without the least inconvenience. I think my rupture is healed and all right, and that I could leave it off all right, but prefer to wear it longer." EDWARD SNOW, Snowville, N. H.

Cured in Five Months. "Dear Sirs: I have worn your truss five months and have taken it off now, and I am cured of rupture. Your truss is the best I ever used; it is better than you recommend it. Other firms praise their ill-constructed, padded trusses very highly, but they are really not good for anything. I have worn them for years and got no better. I would not give one of yours for one hundred of theirs." ANDREW PROPER, Glencoe Mills, N. Y.

A Physician says: "Dear Sirs: I send you herewith an order for one of your trusses. Please send me some of your order blanks so that I may order from your company from time to time for my patients. I have tried your goods and find them O.K." S. O. HUTSON, M.D., Beaufort, S. C.

Cures Double Rupture. "Dear Sirs: I had a double rupture; the right side has healed up, and the left is almost well." WM. WILSON, Doubs, Md.

Was in Great Misery—Cured. "Gentlemen: I have never been troubled any since I put on your truss. I could not say enough in your praise. I can work as hard as ever I could. I do not know that I am cured. I have been afraid to take the truss off yet for fear that I am not. I was so poorly before I began to wear your truss that a whole week would pass and I would not be able to do scarcely anything. I could not ride a mile in a carriage without great misery and being in great danger. Now I can ride with ease." Mrs. NORA CLEM, Kent, Iowa.

Cured my Boy. "Gentlemen: Your truss has cured my boy when no other would, and in the same time you said it would. I am more than thankful to you for it. Every word you said was true. No need of any child suffering when they can be cured so easily." Mrs. MARY YARNELL, Middleton, Ohio.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

IN May, the Moon reaches the place of the Sun, forming the New Moon, where she begins her new journey around the Zodiac, at about thirty minutes past noon of the 9th of the month. The figure set for that moment of time at Washington, the seat of our government, shows the first degrees of Virgo rising and the last degrees of Taurus culminating. The conjoined Sun and Moon are therefore only a half hour past the south meridian in the 9th house. Neptune has not yet come to the meridian but is in the 10th house nearly opposite to Saturn who with Herschel is in the 4th house. Jupiter is in the 3rd; Mars is in the rising part of the heavens in the 12th house in trine with Venus in the 8th also in trine with Herschel in the 4th house.

Mercury is ruler of the scheme and is found on the cusp of the 9th house in trine with the Ascendant and in trine with Saturn in the 4th house. The Lunation forms while both luminaries are separating from adverse rays of Mars and Jupiter and has no evil rays; while Mercury the ruler of the figure is without affliction from any heavenly body. This figure indicates our recent passage through some minor squalls upon the national sea, some evidences of strife between capital and labor, and excitement of unusual character in matters affecting our financial world and probably ecclesiastical connections and detriment to our shipping and railway values.

The great malefics in the 4th are not promising of good to our agricultural interests, being likely to give us some harm to growing crops either through cold and gloomy or stormy atmospheres particularly near the latter days of the lunation or from excessive rains or floods in the northern sections of our country. Mars in the 12th indicates harm to prisoners and cautions keepers of places of detention to be on the lookout for violence from inmates. Postal authorities should take unusual precautions for avoidance of loss of property or detriment to the mails through disorder or violence, especially in our southeastern regions or possessions. We shall hear of much merry making and sporting in our southwestern regions, increased production of wines and luxuries of life.

Mercury on the 9th and the lunation falling on the 9th, give strong indications of an extraordinary increase in travel to foreign countries. Mercury is the herald of a busy period for artists, scientists, and literary and church men; shows advancement in arts and sciences, new inventions and the spread of education and civilization in our southwestern sections.

The figure, for own country is on the whole quite favorable, bearing out as it does our general progress and advancement shown in the more important figure for the Sun's Ingress in March.

Mars in Leo is evil for France and is likely to show the continuance of strife and disorder in that storm-tossed country. Political excitement runs high in France, Italy and Spain, where fires and crimes run a kind of epidemic.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR MAY, 1899.

MAY 1—Monday. The month begins with a fair day for most of the affairs of life, though a greater degree of success than usual is due for transactions with manufacturers and persons in the mechanical callings, also for chemical experiments; being peculiarly favorable for such persons as were born about the last days of March or September, of past years.

2—Tuesday. This day gives favorable conditions for vigorous prosecution of all the elegant occupations and fine arts; for dealings in fancy wares and furnishings, jewelry etc.; urge musical and dramatical engagements and studies and urge thy suit with the fair sex. Have care, however, in these days and especially during the forenoon of this day, to avoid disputes or quarrels of all kinds; look out for fires and explosions, and particularly avoid any unusual excitement if the heart be constitutionally afflicted or has shown any unusual disturbance in the last six or eight months. We are still in the midst of conditions which conduce to increased combustibility in nature and which promote destruction of values by fires and violent explosions. Let all have care in this respect, especially if born about the last days of January, April, July or October of past years. Prevailing conditions for several weeks have been such as render probable a marked increase of blood troubles, scrofulous annoyances, boils, carbuncles, and eruptions generally, and we shall be wise if we have availed ourselves promptly of the preventives and correctives which science affords. The afternoon and evening of this day are recommended for mental labors and literary undertakings of consequence; urge correspondence and the adjustment of accounts.

3—Wednesday. Actively pursue thy several avocations during all this day, giving preference, however, to the forenoon for dealings in real estate, boots and shoes, dyes, wool, coal and all kinds of building materials. Artists and musicians have more than the ordinary executive abilities in their special callings, especially if born about the last days of March, July, September, or November, of past years, and such persons should diligently prosecute their several callings.

4—Thursday. Let every moment of this day be improved; pursue studies and all the literary avocations; journey, and push all kinds of business, especially with lawyers, merchants, tradesmen, printers, publishers and all ingenious persons; literary efforts will in general be successful; do all important correspondence, engage help and make each moment count; musical and dramatic entertainments give unusual pleasure and satisfaction in the evening and social matters are happily affected; seek advancement or favor from thine employer in the last hours of the day, when also apply to public officials for benefits of a public nature.

5—Friday. Ask no favors from thy landlord in the forenoon nor look for benefits from dealings with contractors or any persons engaged in the dirty avocations of life; indecision and forgetfulness will be common faults of the early hours; but as the noon hour is approached conditions mend rapidly and for many hours very favorable influences prevail, which tend to promote success in all honorable undertakings; particular stress is put upon the suggestion that all literary labors be pushed to the utmost and that commercial enterprises be inaugurated with vigor.

6—Saturday. Improve this day fully for all the ingenious and mechanical trades and avocations, and especially for chemical experiments and processes; deal in cattle, metals, and with chemists, founders, physicians, tailors, and military men, also electricians, druggists, inventors of machinery and electrical appliances; take the time for dealing in ornamental goods, wearing apparel, furnishings and all things pertaining to the pleasures and gratifications of mankind.

7—Sunday. A most excellent day for intellectual and religious matters; the mind will be especially active and capable of close application; the judgment is acute and clear, and extemporaneous speaking should abound in rhetoric, good logic, and elegant sentiment. It is rare that so favorable combinations occur in such force within the limits of a day.

8—Monday. Be circumspect in act and deed with reference to all speculative ventures; hold fast the purse-strings; defer making contracts, particularly with landlords or concerning houses or lands; and bridle the tongue as the evening draws nigh, when also see that no risks of fire are taken, being especially careful in handling combustibles and explosives.

9—Tuesday. The middle hours of this day are the best; in them urge all correspondence and literary matters generally; sign contracts other than concerning real estate, engage servants, travel, deal with teachers and divines, lawyers and judges and all engaged in the intellectual pursuits; do not, however, have any dealings with usurers or persons in public office or with the very aged.

10—Wednesday. This day promises but little of moment; do not expect any favor from public officers, railway officials, inventors, nor persons noted for eccentricities of dress or habits, especially as the day draws to its close.

11—Thursday. Another of the very favorable days of the month; the forenoon is peculiarly fortunate for surgeons, military men, cutlers, and all who deal in or employ sharp instruments or fire in their avocations; it is good also for compounding drugs and chemicals, for fine machine work, weaving, painting and all musical execution; for workers in wax, embroiderers, milliners, dressmakers, and all art workers; the drama will be more enjoyable than usual in the evening.

12—Friday. Ask no favors from thy landlord in the early hours nor look for much benefit from dealing with contractors or any persons engaged in the dirty avocations of life; give preference to the middle hours for urging all correspondence, for dealings with booksellers, publishers, stationers and all engaged in the intellectual pursuits; use the afternoon for buying goods for trade and having transactions with banks and persons of wealth and station.

13—Saturday. Usurers and money lenders will prove expensive and disagreeable if appealed to on this day, and old persons generally are to be avoided; don't make any beginning of magnitude in the forenoon hours, nor be surprised if thou art baffled greatly in thy undertakings.

14—Sunday. Rather an unpromising day; let quarrels and contentions be guarded against, nor should pulpit utterances be aggressive or offensive, since they would be more likely thus to hurt than to help.

15—Monday. Have particular care in all commercial transactions in the forenoon hours; the time will develop much fraud and deception in banking circles; sign no money obligations of consequence and be very cautious about extending credit; and postpone transacting business with lawyers; the afternoon is better than the morning particularly for transactions with persons in the elegant pursuits.

16—Tuesday. The day after the morning hours should be improved with vigor, provided judgments be not too hastily formed—a day for sharp and incisive will rather than sound judgment—rashness and combativeness will be especially observable; give preference to the afternoon hours for the most important transactions of the day; especially if they be concerning money or commercial ventures.

17—Wednesday. Use this day for forwarding thy ventures pertaining to the artistic in life, especially if such efforts be directed towards real estate improvements or furnishings, architectural work, horticulture, finishings and decorations; seek no favor or advantage at the hands of thine employer during the middle hours of the day but pursue all the elegant work of life in the afternoon hours; when also enter into important commercial contracts and have thy dealing with monied men and institutions.

18—Thursday. Scrutinize thy business enterprises born on this day and have care that thou art not misled by extravagant representations or over-flattering appearances; beware of extraordinary speculative ventures, especially in stocks; as the time may witness some unusual fluctuations in prices.

19—Friday. A singularly evil day; enter not upon any new business, for no permanent pecuniary advantage will accrue from such now begun; beware of dealings in real estate and generally of parting with thy money in the hope of gain.

20—Saturday. A vigorous and energetic day; seek favor or advantage from persons in authority, officers of large corporations, railroad employees and all government officers.

21—Sunday. The conditions on this Sabbath day are specially conducive to eloquent and energetic efforts from the pulpit and for the appreciation and enjoyment of the best qualities in literature.

22—Monday. Seek not the fair sex nor expect much success in the elegant or artistic pursuits in the first half of this day; the latter part of the afternoon should have the preference for the principal ventures and undertakings of the day, especially in connection with money matters and for dealings with wealthy persons; the late night hours promote combustion and are likely to give unusual activity to the fire department.

23—Tuesday. Have caution in the use of the pen on this day and be not too ready to indulge thy tastes and appetites; postpone thy real estate dealings for a season; see that extravagant inclinations are checked and that the purse strings are held securely; look out for fires again in the evening.

24—Wednesday. Be in no haste to launch thine undertakings of magnitude in the morning hours, for hindrances and disappointments are more likely to accompany such efforts; as the noon hour is approached, however, let all thine energies be put forth in forwarding thine undertakings already in hand, but do not make new beginnings.

25—Thursday. Give preference to the middle hours of the day for thy principal efforts, especially in connection with the manufacturing and mechanical trades; when also deal with the machinist, engineer, traveler, tanner, brewer, founder, and dealer in cattle and metals. Particularly shun officers of large corporations and government officials and employees.

26—Friday. Enter into no contract concerning real estate in the first half of this day, when also avoid thy landlord and postpone thy dealings with very aged persons; after the noon hours let all honorable undertakings be crowded to the utmost; buy goods for trade; seek money accommodations, and have transactions with banks and persons of wealth.

27—Saturday. Let the elegant avocations be vigorously prosecuted during the middle hours of this day; when also deal in fancy and decorative goods. The day is not auspicious for the beginning of any great undertaking, and great caution will need to be exercised to prevent being misled by false and flattering promises of new schemes and enterprises now presenting themselves. This caution is particularly enjoined upon persons born about the 24th of February, 27th of May, or August, or the 30th of November, of past years, and such persons will be particularly wise to safeguard the health in these passing days, seeing that all threatening symptoms of liver and bowels and lung troubles are promptly treated.

28—Sunday. The mind is especially active in the morning and religious discourses will be earnest and eloquent.

29—Monday. Look carefully to the purse in the forenoon, scrutinizing expenditures rigidly and indulging not in money speculations; seek favor from public officials during the middle hours of the day; shun the fair sex in the early afternoon, but expect pleasure and satisfaction from the social, musical or dramatic entertainment of the evening.

30—Tuesday. Mixed and conflicting influences prevail at this time; beware of signing thy name to any important writings; scrutinize signatures and be duly watchful against thievery; let counsellors and judges be slow in decisions; let all have care in handling combustibles and explosives; the afternoon is the better part of the day and should be employed for urging all routine matters and enterprises already in hand.

31—Wednesday. The very early and very late hours are the best; but do not depend upon the middle hours for new work; business propositions presenting themselves for the first time during the middle hours are likely to be delusive and unprofitable, nor should any favor be looked for in thy dealings with government officials or persons generally in authority; the musical and dramatic engagements of the evening will prove very enjoyable and unusually successful.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

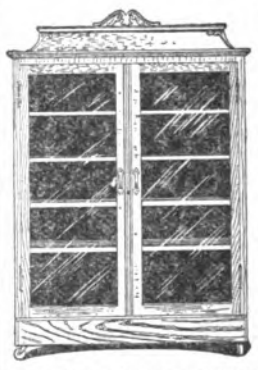
Mataafa, the claimant to the throne of Samoa has three times found his way blocked to the semblance of regal honors that the Kingship of Samoa gives. Seventy years of age, worn and broken he is yet the ablest man, the best fitted to rule in the kingdom. Mataafa was one of the two vice kings when Germany deposed the weak inefficient Malietoa Lanpepa and set up in his place his assistant Samoaese. The natives rebelled and tried to make Mataafa king. England, Germany and America were drawn into the dispute and it seemed at one time that war between the great powers would result. The great storm that wrecked the battleship in the harbor at Apia will never be forgotten. The great disaster brought the nations to a calmer view and the Berlin treaty of 1891 was made. Equal powers of residence, trade and personal protection were given the three nations. The Samoan Government was declared independent and the people were to be allowed to choose their king. A Supreme Court consisting of one Judge was constituted. He was to be selected by the three powers, or if they failed to agree by the King of Norway and Sweden. The deposed Malietoa was also replaced on the throne. Mataafa had been made king by the nation but he yielded his place and became a sort of prime minister. He was a strong and brave man and the king was weak. They could not work together and Mataafa withdrew in a dignified manner to Malietoa. The people of Samoa universally desired him to be king and outbreaks in his favor were frequent. Finally Germany demanded that he be exiled to the Marshall Islands. Early last year, the poor weak king died and his no less weak son Malietoa Sanus wishes the throne. The Germans now thought that Mataafa might be useful to them and brought him back from exile. The nation that had always been against him now advocated his claim. At the time of the Berlin treaty they hated him and by a clause of the treaty he was debarred from rule. The people elected Mataafa king by a vast majority, but upon the submission of the election to the Chief Justice, it was declared that Mataafa was barred by the Berlin treaty. William M. Chambers an Alabamian is the present justice. The decision has brought the situation to a crisis that resembles that of 1891. War ships of the three nations are again in the beautiful harbor of Apia. Quiet, noble, dignified, the old Mataafa awaits a decision. Robert Louis Stevenson who knew him well declared him more fit to be king than any one in Samoa. Mataafa is a devout Catholic, a strong, just kindly man. The very nation that now urges his claim to kingship inserted the clause which the American justice declares renders his election void. The outcome is one of great interest to three nations and again the three flags flutter in the Samoan sunshine and the people and the patient old Mataafa await the result.

Abbas II., Khedive of Egypt is the nominal ruler of one of the most ancient countries in the world. He has little opportunity to show any strength as a ruler but Abbas Pasha has proved himself a skillful man of affairs in all that relates to his private business. He speaks five languages fluently—English, German, French, Arabic and Turkish. He was educated in Vienna and Switzerland. The Khedive is below the middle height and has shown a tendency towards stoutness. His large dark eyes have the dreamy expression of the East but their owner shows a hard practical business sense worthy of a Yankee. He rises at daybreak and spends the time until eight o'clock in an inspection of his estates. These are conducted in a European manner, a Scotch bailiff from the Agricultural College at Gizeh being in charge. After breakfasting, the Khedive drives into Cairo and spends his morning in the official business of Egypt. Any person with a grievance may drop a petition in a slit of the palace wall. After three o'clock the official day is over and the time until evening is spent upon the estate. The opera or some social affair occupies the evenings not spent with his family. The Khedive aside from the public property which he holds is a large private landholder. For some years he has been in the habit of purchasing lands that are seemingly worthless and bringing them under cultivation by the engineering skill of Europeans. He purchased an estate of nearly 10,000 acres, only 178 acres being productive. Over fifty miles of drainage canals were constructed and 1500 acres are now arable. Abbas II. shows his European training but in spite of it all he is an Oriental with the mental attitude characteristic of the East.

Monsieur Emile Loubet has just been chosen seventh president of the third French Republic. He was elected on one ballot of the Republican party. He has long been a prominent figure in political life. He comes from the south of France and is a plain, practical, hard-headed man from the middle walks of life. He was a well-known provincial lawyer before he entered public life. He has a thickset figure and a massive Roman head. In 1871 he was elected Senator and was made Minister of Public Works. Under Carnot he was Prime Minister and took the portfolio of the Interior. This ministry he was forced to resign on account of the Panama scandal but Mr. Loubet was in no way implicated. He was again chosen to the Senate and was elected its President in 1896 and again last year. He held this position when chosen President of France. He is much beloved in his home province and has the respect of all the foreign nations.

Agoncillo, the Filipino agent to this country, is the type of an educated native. He has a certain amount of native shrewdness and intelligence. He can hardly claim to rank with his teachers of diplomacy—the Spaniards. Agoncillo has talked very freely up to the beginning of actual hostilities. When he left Washington for Montreal he claimed that the move was to secure advices from Aguinaldo. The outbreak of war recalled him to the Philippines. He is a slight, undersized man with a rather weak face.

Aguinaldo, the famous leader of the Philippine insurgents is hardly the savage that some of the paragraphers picture him to be. His gold whistle is the outward sign of his only weak spot and that is an enormous vanity. He looks like a fragile, unformed boy with stooping shoulders and narrow chest. He has marked Mongolian features with the high cheek bones, oblique eyes, short nose and thick lips of the race. His skin is deeply pitted from the ravages of smallpox. His face is smooth, with no sign of a beard but his hair is abundant, coarse and black. Aguinaldo has an extremely nervous manner, never remaining quiet for one moment. His love of display is shown by his sign of authority, a gold whistle and by a large solitaire diamond which he wears upon his left hand. His face has the appearance of being slightly drawn to one side, a peculiar distortion common among the Filipinos. The foreign residents of Manila have long considered Aguinaldo as the smartest Filipino in the island and his rise to leadership has been no surprise.



Miss Beatrice Herford is a young American woman who is widely known for her great success as a reader. She writes her own monologues which are character sketches of familiar English and American types. From the moment she appears before her audience she ceases to be Miss Herford and the character that she is personating lives before her audience. Miss Herford in private life is the wife of S. W. Hayward. She is the daughter of a Boston clergyman, the late Rev. Brooke Herford. As a child she was fond of the "make believe" of the average child but her favorite character was "Mrs. Roller". This name she had seen on a door plate and it seemed to her to be very elegant and high-sounding. So as "Mrs. Roller" she made frequent calls upon her family. This instinctive love of mimicry grew as the child grew. She began to imitate people to entertain her friends. Her brother is the well-known artist, Oliver Herford, and Miss Herford studied art for several years spending most of her time in London. All this time, she says she was pining to act. Finally her friends urged that she try some of her mimicry in public. Henry James, the well-known author, Zangwill, Bernard Shaw and William Archer were invited and Miss Herford gave a recital. Her success was assured. From that day she has devoted her talent to monologue entertainment. Her work at first was as a drawing-room entertainer but during the past winter she has drawn audiences that filled many of the best New York theaters. She writes her own monologues and never attempts to imitate men. She keeps a notebook in which she carefully notes the idioms, mannerisms and speech of people with whom she comes in contact. This is instinctive with her. She says she sometimes tries not to watch people but she comes in tired out and then realizes that she has been carefully noticing all the people she has met. She does not practice in front of a glass. She tried it once and found herself so self conscious that all the spontaneity was gone from her work. The Sociable Seamstress is one of her best liked monologues. It is the delicate realism of her work that has given Miss Herford her high rank.

Miss Evelyn Fletcher is the inventor of a new method of teaching music to children. By her way, music, the language of the soul is made an open book to the child. Toys, games, songs and stories are used and the sense of touch plays a most important part in the method. The system has met with the approval of many eminent musicians and has been introduced into the New England Conservatory of Music, the Temple College of Music and also in leading musical institutions in London and Toronto. Miss Fletcher comes of a musical family. Miss Fletcher is a Canadian but was educated in England. She plays both the violin and piano, studying these instruments in Belgium, Germany and Switzerland for nearly five years. It was while teaching music to a class of children in Toronto that the idea of formulating her method occurred to Miss Fletcher. She now has her headquarters in New York and devotes her time to training teachers in her method. She has been asked to demonstrate her method before the Royal Academy of Music in London and will soon go abroad for that purpose. The teachers who have studied her method have formed a club known as the Fletcher Musical Association. They publish a journal and report to one another any new plans or suggestions. As a child Miss Fletcher deeply regretted that she was not a boy so that she might engage in her father's profession of law. She now feels that the aid she is giving to the advance of a knowledge of music may add as much to the progress of the world as the work that seemed to her young mind more important.

Cat shows and cat lore and literature have become somewhat prominent of late, but John H. Dolph has long appreciated the charms of Grimalkin. His pictures of cats long since made him famous. So thoroughly has he become identified with his line of work that many people are surprised to know that Dolph ever painted anything but cats. That he attained distinction in this line is the result of a happy accident. His earlier pictures were of home-life on the farm. He had always wished to paint animals and in his first trip abroad studied with Louis Van Knyck at Antwerp. Van Knyck had won great fame as a painter of horses. On Dolph's return he found it necessary to produce an immediate "pot boiler." He found a little frame in his studio and cutting a canvass to fit it painted the nearest subject. This chanced to be a kitten that was frisking around the room. The picture sold instantly for one hundred dollars. Other cats were painted and by 1875, Dolph had become known as the Cat Artist. Mr. Dolph was born in Cleveland, Ohio, where his first art studies were made under the direction of Allen Smith. He succeeded in supporting himself during this time by decorating the interior of passenger coaches. Some years were spent in Detroit and Chicago as a portrait painter and artist of genre subjects. Later, five years were spent in New York. Hunting pictures, figure subjects and portraits were painted but sales were slow until his great success in 1875. Once since then he has given up his specialty and painted what he liked. For five years he studied the architecture of Paris and the history of France and filled his studio with paintings and studies of the time of Louis XIII. The public would have none of it. It was Dolph's cats that it demanded and cats it would have. Mr. Dolph is a large, handsome man with an inexhaustible fund of stories and good nature. His New York studio is in the Sherwood building but he has a country home at Ardsley, N. Y., where the cats who have showed him the path to fame and fortune frolic unmolested.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY EDMUND VANCE COOKE.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"GIVE me a room," I said when I had left the record of my name and town and had javellined the pen in the raw potato provided for it.

I remember that the clerk had the smooth appearance and self-possessed manner of his kind. Moreover he had dark hair and brows, both plentifully sprinkled with white, which fact added greatly to his empressment. He caught a glimpse of my name on the register and although he had never seen me before, he responded with a mixture of dignity and deference.

"We'll do the best we can for you, Mr. Voakes, but we're loaded to the roof," which speech displayed his standing and experience in his calling.

He was behind the desk now, running over the little slips under the room-numbers and seemingly having difficulty in discovering a place to put me.

"Did you want to go to your room at once, Mr. Voakes?"

"Just as soon as I can get it."

"I thought perhaps you were going out and I might find a better room for you a little later, after the 11.10 flyer leaves," he suggested.

"Better give me something now," I answered. "I've traveled all day and I'm tired."

He returned to his search again and presently he was joined by a little stoop-headed man, with stern eyes, looking out from under beetling brows. I could see at a glance that he was the proprietor and that while he tolerated his patrons with no unpleasantness towards them, still he was fully aware of the service he was doing us by conducting a hotel.

"We're full up," I heard the clerk say. "How about four-hundred-and-seven?"

The inset eyes twitched nervously as their owner drew nearer to the clerk and muttered something. He scanned the room-lists himself, gave the matter a few seconds consideration and nodded briefly. "Open it," he said and then I noticed that he glanced towards me almost timidly. The clerk struck the bell. "Front, tell the head-chambermaid to make up four-hundred-and-seven quick."

I saw "Front" dart a curious, half-startled glance at me and then he was off in a flash. By this time I had made up my mind that there would be "kick coming" against No. 407. Ordinarily I am not a hard mortal to please, but I have traveled long enough to learn that a man may as well have all the comfort he is paying for and dignified hotel-clerks with white-streaked hair and distinguished airs respect him none the more if he allows himself to be imposed upon. I waited as patiently as I could and was very shortly rewarded by the information that my room awaited its occupant. Another "Front" grasped "key 407" and my satchel and escorted me to the elevator. "Floor!" ejaculated the elevator-boy grumpily to the bell-boy.

It was a very small thing, but I noticed that instead of giving a direct answer, my little guide thrust the brass key-tag under the eyes of his questioner. His eyes were shining and his lips were parted in a half-grin to which was added a subdued cast of awesome excitement.

The sluggish elevator-operator glanced at the key and I could see that even his interest was quickened and the "Swanee River," which he was softly whistling, suddenly ceased to flow.

The bell-boy made a remark or two apropos of nothing on the way down the hall and when we came to the room he dropped my "grip," fumbled away at the key-hole and when he flung the door open, he stepped back with a "Here you are, sir!"

Now everybody knows that it is the ordinary habit of the genus bell-boy to rush into the room, make a light, throw open the window and ask the guest if anything more is wanted. "Make a light!" I said, with a touch of impatience. "Is it gas, or electric?"

"Gas, sir," answered the boy, producing some matches, but still standing at the door. "Would you please to light it, sir. I'm too short to reach it, but it's right there," and he pointed into the darkness.

I struck a match and lit the gas and examined the room critically, and somewhat disappointedly, for I could see no slightest cause for complaint, beyond a somewhat close and oppressive atmosphere. I took the first step towards remedying this by throwing the window wide open and noticed that it opened on the platform of a fire-escape. I always make it a point to notice the "provisions in case of a fire" in a hotel anyway. I turned back and saw that the bell-boy had not gone, but still stood at the door.

"If you want anything," he said, "you can ring the bell, you know."

I looked at the boy amusedly. What had I done that he should take me for a benighted being unused to hotel bells? Or was he waiting for a tip? "Thank you," I responded, "I'll ring for you to come up and blow out the gas. Meanwhile, I wish you'd bring me some ice-water and a little stationery."

He was back with these in a jiffy. "Did you want to leave a call?" he asked.

"Eight o'clock," I answered.

If I had sent a bullet at him, it could hardly have produced a greater effect than these simple words. He turned ghastly pale, shot a last glance at me and took to his heels.

I communed with myself and decided that the people around that hotel were a queer crowd, meanwhile settling myself to write a letter home, before going to bed. As it was a warm June night I made myself as comfortable as possible by removing my coat and vest, collar, cuffs and tie.

I pulled out a drawer in my dresser for the accommodation of these furnishings and as I flung them in, I noticed that the paper lining the drawer was a Buffalo Courier. That being my home town and newspaper, it gave me a little homesick twinge and at the same time attracted another glance or two. A moment later I found myself reading the following item.

"Washington, May 16—Russell Apworthy aged 35 and unmarried was found dead in a room in the Treverton hotel at 8 o'clock, last night. All the circumstances point to suicide. He registered at the hotel at 10 P. M. and left a call for 8 A. M. When called he was found dead upon the floor and partly dressed. It is regarded as significant that Apworthy was assigned to room 407. There have been three deaths by suicide in that room since April first, one of them a former mayor of Leavenworth, with whom Apworthy is said to have been acquainted. It was a peculiar coincidence that in every case the suicide left a call for 8 A. M."

I have no hesitation in declaring that a shudder of alarm ran over me as I read that item and then I glanced around hastily and fearfully, though the gas lit the room up brightly. I looked at every corner. I looked in the closet. I scanned the walls for unsuspected doors, I even looked under the bed! "Bosh!" I said, "I've never committed suicide yet and I sha'n't to-night. What is there to be afraid of, anyway? But Apworthy, Apworthy; that name is odd, yet it sounds familiar."

I wrote my letter and then concluded I would turn in. I was sleepily standing before the glass preparatory to disrobing, when my glance caught the reflection of a human form, half crouched on my window-ledge and framed by my open window. It looked as if it had flown from somewhere and alighted there.

I have heard of hearts standing still and blood suddenly stagnating in the veins, but I never experienced the sensation before that moment. However, I am quite satisfied with the one experience. I want it repeated never.

I whirled in my tracks and then my heart gave a great bound and struggled to regain operations.

"Hello, Ha! Voakes!" laughed the figure, entering, "don't you know me?"

"Logan!" I gasped; then the room spun around and a blackness surged up over my eyes. Just why I should have held up until I recognized my old school-friend, Logan, whom I had neither seen nor heard from for several months, and then should have caved in, I do not know. Perhaps it was because I realized, then, that I was in good hands and there was no particular reason why I shouldn't give way. I am not subject to anything of the kind and have never fainted before or since, but the oppressiveness of that room and the different trifles of the evening had combined to unnerve me. Logan and I had been friends for years, but a few months previously we had both taken up new pursuits and as he lived in St. Louis and I in Buffalo, we had allowed our former friendly interest to suffer a lapse.

I think I remained unconscious but a minute or two. I was on the bed when I opened my eyes and I struggled up very much dazed and very much ashamed of myself.

"I must say you give a fellow a cordial welcome when he returns from Mexico," laughed Logan, who was always merry and always doing and saying the unexpected.

"Mexico! I didn't know you had been there. We—we must talk it over in the morning."

"Yes," he said. "I didn't know my appearance would shock you so, but it's this devilish hotel. I've had a prejudice against it ever since April first."

"April first," I repeated, vaguely forgetting for the moment the date of the first suicide mentioned in the article, but noticing that my companion had grown grave.

"Yes; don't let's talk about it." he answered and then with his old, well-remembered, quizzical air, he added, "I know why you are here. Why will you do it? I suppose there's no stopping you, though. Ah me, the force of bad examples! But there! I'm going to leave you. You need a good sound sleep. You're sure you're all right, are you? Lots of courage and all that? Well, I'll see you in the morning."

He slipped out of the door and then he thrust his head back in again to say, "By the way, we must look up Apworthy in the morning. You remember him? A mighty jolly, good fellow. Don't you recall him? I introduced you to him in Leavenworth one time. He was stopping with his friend, the Mayor."

Of the night which I put in in that room, I shall say nothing. Suffice it that long before my call for 8 A. M., I was down in the office. The clerk of the distingue air was still on duty and I went up to him. "Look here, my friend," I said, "if you ever give me room four-hundred-and-seven again, it will result in something more than a suicide." It was worth a night of horrors to notice the wilt of that clerk's assurance.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"I mean that there have been three cases of suicide in four-hundred-and-seven since April first and it's a deuced uncanny room to sleep in."

"Who told you that?" demanded the clerk.

"Nobody told me. I found it out for myself last night, after I reached my room," I retorted, enjoying his discomfiture.

The clerk's face was a study. "Well," said he after a pause, "did you—did you see anything?"

I preferred to change the subject at this point, so I responded with a brief "Maybe;" and added "by the way, what's the number of Mr. Logan's room?"

To my surprise, the clerk exhibited more concern that ever.

"There's no Mr. Logan staying here!" he cried, with unnecessary emphasis, as it struck me.

"Why there must be!" I exclaimed in turn. "He was in my room last night."

The clerk swallowed something and wet his lips before he answered slowly: "You say you saw Mr. Logan in your room last night?"

"Certainly."

He leaned over the counter and said in a strained voice: "A bell-boy, a chambermaid, the night-porter and, now, you have all told me that Mr. Logan was seen in the hotel last night. I don't know how you know it, but Logan was the name of the man who occupied four-hundred-and-seven on the night of April first."

"Andrew Logan!" I gasped, "the first suicide?"

"No, not Andrew Logan, Albert Logan. See here!" He turned to April first on the register and showed me the signature—"Albert Logan, Mexico City, Mex."

I said nothing, but I sat down and tried to think. "Albert Logan? Why, yes, Andrew's twin brother. He had been in Mexico for years. There was no ghost about it. I had seen Albert and—," then there flashed on me the struggling bits of conversation of the previous night. The mysterious allusions to his return from Mexico, to April first, to Apworthy and the Mayor of Leavenworth. It had been Albert Logan I had seen.

And his assertion that he had known why I was there and he would see me in the morning and we would see those other unfortunate self-slayers! Surely he must have meant that I was designed for the next victim. Ugh! my flesh crawled when I considered it all.

"Mr. Clerk," I said, "send up for my grip. I'm going to leave."

"I can give you another room," he suggested humbly.

"Not in this town, you can't," I retorted firmly.

He shook my hand at parting and remarked solemnly: "If I ever assign four-hundred-and-seven again, I hope I'll hang for it."

* * * * * *

I reached Buffalo in good time, though I had a strong notion to go to St. Louis instead, look up my old chum and tell him of my wonderful interview with his dead brother. It was lucky I didn't, however, for I was only back a day or two when I received a telegram dated from Pittsburg and signed by my old chum. He was coming to see me. I went down to the train filled full of the long startling story I had for him. His first words, as he came through the station-gate, knocked it clear out of me.

"Why the mischief did you run away from me in Washington?" he demanded.

"From you?" I cried.

"Yes, from me," he retorted, laughing at my amazed countenance. "And when I went to look you up at the Treverton that morning, I thought the clerk would have a spasm. Why, they pretty nearly called the Fire Department to put me out!"

"Hold on, Andrew!" I cried. "For Heaven's sake, let me get this by degrees. How did you happen to come in through my window like Poe's 'grim, ungainly, ghastly' raven?"

"Just one of my jokes, of course. I had a room at the St. Elmo, which runs back and jogs against the Treverton. You had your window up and a bright light burning and I could see you from my room as plainly as I can this minute. I discovered that the two fire-escapes came together, so I crawled out on mine, over to yours and into your window. I thought I'd surprise you—and I did."

"And Mexico?"

"I have just come from there, settling up poor Bert's affairs. The shock of his death and the time it has taken to straighten out his estate explain why you haven't heard from me lately."

"And Apworthy and the Mayor of Leavenworth?"

"Say, that's sad," he answered in a sober tone. "Apworthy was a splendid fellow. I didn't know much about his friend, the Mayor. When I spoke to you I just remembered that Apworthy had written me that he and the Mayor were going to Washington to spend several weeks. I didn't know of their following poor Bert till it all came out at the hotel the other morning."

"But didn't you say something about knowing why I was there and—and that sort of thing?"

"Of course I did. I was chaffing you a little, pretending that you were there to look after your fences with Miss Winifred, for I confess her sister had a strong influence on my being in Washington. I didn't know you were in four-hundred-and-seven and in fact never knew the number of the room poor Bert occupied."

I gazed at him in silence for a moment and then I said, "well, you are the biggest failure of a ghost I ever saw in my life. After you have a dead sure case for yourself, you come around and don't leave your believers a thread to hang by!"

The Mascot of Horse Shoe Hill.

"WHAT about him?" exclaimed old Bill Greves, pausing in his work of stuffing "longcut" into the blackened bowl of his clay pipe, to glance around the room in surprise. "It used to be hard to find people in these parts who had never heard of him; let alone those that claimed they had seen him. But, then," after a pause, "that was years ago. But I shall remember him as long as I live, gentlemen, for I saw him once myself." A silence of expectancy followed, and while the snowed-in crews settled themselves comfortably in the warmth of the whitewashed stove, the old man lighted his pipe and proceeded:

"Any of you fellows who ever traveled over the 'Sunderland Valley' as long as fifteen years ago know all about the Horse Shoe Hill—com-

The Great Huxley.

What Huxley, the Great English Scientist, Considered the Best Start in Life.

The great English scientist, Huxley, said the best start in life is a sound stomach. Weak stomachs fail to digest food properly because they lack the proper quantity of digestive acids (lactic and hydrochloric) and peptogenic products; the most sensible remedy in all cases of indigestion is to take after each meal one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets because they supply in a pleasant harmless form all the elements that weak stomachs lack.

The regular use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will cure every form of stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach.

They increase flesh, insure pure blood, strong nerves, a bright eye and clear complexion, because all these result only from wholesome food well digested.

Nearly all druggists sell Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets at 50 cents full-sized package.

ing up around the mountain there out of Limesville, fifty feet to the mile, crooked as its name, and running over two of the riskiest bridges that ever held up a train. Why they ever built over such a hill instead of tunneling, most people could never understand; but the reason for it is connected with my story. It seemed that when the road was first talked of they made two different surveys. One of these ran the line over the mountain as it was afterwards built, and the other took it through the range by a tunnel. Most of the stockholders wanted to run the line through the mountain because they thought the hill line would be so dangerous as to make the road unpopular. But there was a man named Graham connected with the concern—a hard, miserly man—who voted against this idea because he thought the hill line would be cheaper to build. He said that danger was not a thing for the stockholders to consider, for the freight traffic would support the road, so if people didn't want to ride over it they could walk. Now it was all very well for him to talk that way, but he knew, the same as all of them knew, that the road would be the only outlet for the travel and commerce of the whole region, and that of course the passenger traffic would be large. But the old man held out with his majority of the shares, though the others beat him out as far as numbers went, and the line was built over the hill. But it wasn't much of a victory. The very first train over the road, after the construction trains had been taken off, was wrecked at the upper bridge, and Graham's wife and child were killed.

"The old man went stark crazy after that, and they had to shut him up at Boynton and put a guard over him. But he broke away from them one night and got out, and nobody ever knew exactly what became of him. There was a body found in the Ossetomanie shortly afterwards which was supposed to be Graham's, but nobody could identify it positively.

"It must have been a month after this that I was promoted from firing to pulling extra freight, and about the same time, too, that a brakeman on one of the night runs began to tell about frequently passing a strange acting man on different parts of the big grade. The stranger was described as an old man with white hair, dressed in one of these long frock coats, but never wearing a hat or carrying a lantern. He was generally seen hanging around in the woods or on the track near the upper bridge. Sometimes he was examining the masonry of the retaining walls, or again testing loose joints along the track after the train had passed.

"It wasn't long before one or two of the other boys got glimpses of him, and he was always about the same. Finally one morning the trackwalker found that some loose stones in the masonry of the bridge had shaken loose in the night, but had been propped into place with a lot of heavy ties, which had kept the bridge from falling. This caused a good deal of excitement, and most of the boys said it was clear as glass that it was old man Graham's ghost up there, trying to square himself. There were two sides to that opinion, though, and finally the holders of the opinions compromised and agreed to call it a Mascot, which it certainly had been. I don't pretend to say what else it might have been. I'm only going to tell you the speech of people, and just what I saw myself.

"We didn't have any regular time—of course running extra, and quite often we would hit the big hill at night, going or coming. I used to look for the Mascot often enough, but it seemed as if I should never get to see him. Finally there came a day when I felt that if there was a Mascot around anywhere I needed him pretty badly. We had hard luck from the beginning of our run that day. First Jack McCann, one of our brakemen, got his hand smashed making a coupling at Gregory; and it wasn't twenty miles further on that we struck a team at the Blue Cut highway crossing and killed the old man that was driving. I was wishing that the third misfortune would happen quick, so as to have it all done and over with, but it didn't come. My fireman got down at our next stop and found a four leaf clover and put it in his shoe. I never took much stock in that sort of thing anyway, and it just showed me that he wasn't feeling very easy himself. But nothing happened, good or bad, aside from the engine steaming badly, and we pulled into Boltonville, the end of our run.

"We had to double right out of Boltonville again, and with our own switching to do we didn't have much chance to get rested and settle down. But after we'd got our train made up, and were lying in the yard waiting orders we had a little time to think; and just at this time it began to rain.

"Now you know as well as I do how nasty weather will affect a man when he's got the blues. My fireman, Tom King, put up the curtains in the gangway to keep out the storm, and both of us just sat there and watched the drops of water trickling down the cab windows, and never saying a word. I was pretty young then, and hadn't seen much of death, and it seemed to me all the time we sat there that I could see the face of that man we'd run into that morning looking in from the dark outside.

"We got our orders at last and pulled out. I remember standing up and waving my hand to the operator at the registry station, and he was a fellow I had never liked very well, either. Then I began to see what a fool I was, and I said to myself: 'See here, Bill, you brace up, and quit acting like an old woman.'

"Out on the line the storm was heavier, and there was quite a bit of lightning. We made pretty slow time on account of poor steaming, and we had to use sand on all the grades. But we pounded off the miles without any mishap; and after we'd stopped for water three times and found everything all right I was breathing a good deal easier.

"Then we came into the mountain district, and there the storm seemed to get worse every minute. I never saw such lightning before nor since, and that thunder boomed and grated till I swear I thought the cab windows would break with the jar. It wasn't far from three o'clock when we got to the top of the big hill. There were no air brakes on freight engines in those days and I was a little afraid of the grade because we'd used up all our sand. But my fireman and I set the tank brake, and I shut off and reversed, and thought I wouldn't call the boys out on deck in the storm unless it became necessary.

"We began to drop down the hill at a good sharp pace. We rounded the upper curve at 25 miles an hour, and swung into the reverse below with a lurch that nearly threw me from my seat. Then we were moving! The engine was rolling heavily, and the rattle of the drivers over the low joints came so fast that, for a fact, the rails seemed only about a yard long; and the noise we made running by those rocky walls was something awful.

"Pretty soon the lightning showed up one of those little mountain road crossings, where the 'corduroy' crosses the track. They seldom use those roads at night, but for some reason I can't explain I reached for the whistle rope and blew a crossing signal that could have been heard in Limesville. Ten minutes later we swung around the last curve and onto the long tangent that drops straight to the bottom of the hill.

"As we came around I thought I caught a glimpse of a light, way ahead. I yelled to King to watch and hung out my window to look for it. It was a light sure enough—a very small one, and about a mile ahead. King thought it looked like a fire on the track; but I was sure I saw it move. The next instant my heart almost stood still, for I placed the thing exactly; it was at the upper bridge! And it moved—I was sure of it—making the stop signal right across the track.

"I whistled for brakes, and sent King back to help the boys with the train. Then I opened the throttle on the reversed engine; but the rail was like grease, and the drivers backed without holding us up at all. We were so close now that I could make out the figure of a man, standing on the edge of the abutment and waving some kind of a blazing torch. Then the figure would get kind of indistinct, or as though you could see through it, and behind it I saw the bridge was blazing. It was the Mascot! I knew it in a minute, by the boys' description. I couldn't make out his face, but I could see his long coat, and made out his white hair as distinctly as I see you now. But glad as I was to see him, it looked as if he had come too late. Even then half the wheels on the train were sliding, and our speed was no slower. Suddenly while I was watching him he gave a fearful yell, and the bridge went down behind him and carried him into the swollen stream.

"I made up my mind it was all up, and jumped for the gangway. But at the same moment we ran into something gritty on the rails. The drivers caught it and almost stood still, and then it took hold of the sliding wheels of the tank. I climbed back to my seat and opened the cylinder cocks to relieve the awful pressure, and in a minute more we came to a standstill within thirty feet of the place where the bridge had been.

"We found the rails covered with sand for some distance back—some of the boys thought it had washed down from the mountain, but if they'd been in the cab they would have known better. The bit of the bridge that was left was still smoking; it had been struck by lightning.

"The Mascot never was heard of again.

"Now I've had people laugh at this experience of mine, and they can do so if they want to; but you can't tell me that when sand comes down a mountain side and deposits itself on the rail to save a train, and burning bridges go waving a stop signal, that there isn't something supernatural going on somewhere; and especially under circumstances such as I have described.

"But it's all past now, and the scene of it is gone too; for the very next year after the bridge burned the company abandoned the hill line, and tunneled through the mountain as they had first intended."

THE GENTLEMANLY RATTLESNAKE.

CONTRASTED WITH THE GHOULISH GERM.

Imagine a man's path leading him through a section of country in which there were millions of rattlesnakes! With what caution and circumspection he would take every step. He would however, have a fair chance of coming to his journey's end in safety, because a rattlesnake, like an old-fashioned clock, warns before it strikes. The rattlesnake stands as the type of the deadliest foes of the human race. But there are foes quite as deadly and more to be feared than rattlesnakes. Germs that strike at the vital centers of life; germs of foul diseases deadly as the venom of the snake, and giving no warning of their presence, infest the air we breathe, the water we drink. Once introduced into the blood they multiply with fearful rapidity, absolutely eating up the very principle of life. Compared with a disease germ a rattlesnake is a gentleman. He is a fair fighter. He tells you to look out. You have a chance to fight or run. The disease germ sneaks upon you. It comes while you are sleeping. It gains an entrance to the blood. In a few days or even hours it multiplies to millions until your blood is full of its offspring. They go all over the body seeking a weak spot. They don't rattle—they strike.

"The blood is the life," and the germ assaults the blood. The microscope reveals the germ of malaria, honeycombing the health by devitalizing the red corpuscles. You've cracked a hazel nut sometime and found in it nothing but dust and a little white worm. The meat of the nut is all eaten up. The malaria germ eats out the vital principle of the corpuscles in just that way. The result is collapse. The thought of a rattlesnake frightens us. Yet the snake is not one tithe as dangerous as the little germ, mining, like a mole, a passageway along the veins and arteries by which it is preparing to assault the citadel of life.

The condition of the blood which indicates the undermining presence of disease germs is marked by languor, a feeling of sluggishness, dull headache, inability to make any effort in business and indifference to all forms of pleasure. The appetite is bad, the breath foul. Disturbing dreams rob the sleep of all refreshing influence. There is nervousness and irritation. The blood seems hot in the fingers and there are hot flushes all over the body. The eyes burn, and specks seem to float before them. These symptoms will not all be present at once, as they belong to different stages of disease; nor is it probable any one person will experience them all. But any of such symptoms indicate the prompt need of a tonic, a medicine that will put vitality into the blood enough to give it strength to destroy and cast out the invading germs.

In such a condition the remarkable efficacy of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has been proved over and over again in thousands of cases. Acting directly on the organs of digestion and nutrition, and upon the blood-making glands, its first influence is to strengthen the entire system, clearing away obstructions and carrying away effete matter and poisonous accumulations. The blood is enriched and the germs of disease, which like all other parisites flourish best in filth, forsake the blood which is cleansed of its filthy accumulations. "Golden Medical Discovery" works with Nature. It comes to Nature when she is worn out with fighting, just like a timely reinforcement bringing food and ammunition, and with new strength and power Nature battles against disease and overcomes it.

There is no alcohol, whisky or other stimulant in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. That is a point to bear in mind when considering the value of a tonic medicine. Most so-called tonics are loaded with alcohol. They only brace up for the time, re-acting injuriously upon the diseased system.

"I was troubled with malarial fever and was under doctor's care for quite a time," writes Mr. J. F. Kidd, of Parmleysville, Wayne Co., Ky. "They had almost given me up, and my suffering was very great. My pulse was weak, breath short and I had severe pains in back, head and legs. Had palpitation of heart, and from June 1st, 1895, to May 1st, 1898, I was not able to do a day's work. I purchased five bottles of Dr. R. V. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and before I had finished taking the first two bottles I was very much better of my disease of three years' standing. I continued taking the medicine, and by the time the fifth bottle was gone I was a well man. I can cheerfully recommend Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery to any similar sufferer."

Such testimony as this is the most practical and convincing argument which can be advanced for the healing and invigorating power of the "Golden Medical Discovery." Thousands upon thousands have used it and ninety-eight per cent. of these have found a cure even when vitality had fallen to a low ebb, and distressing cough, bleeding at the lungs and other serious symptoms had appeared.

"Words fail to express what I suffered for three years, with cold chills, palpitation of heart, shortness of breath, and low spirits," writes Mrs. A. C. Jones, of Walterboro, Colleton Co., S. C. "I could not sleep and really thought I would soon die. Had a peculiar roaring through my head all the time. Was so emaciated and weak I could not feed myself. My aunt induced me to try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which I did, only to please her, and six bottles cured me. To-day I am sound and well. During the three years I was sick I had five different physicians."

The dealer who offers a substitute for "Golden Medical Discovery" filches not only his customers' money to make an extra profit, but also his health. For there is no other medicine "just as good" as "Golden Medical Discovery" for the stomach, blood and lungs. Insist upon having the "Discovery."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser is a helpful book. JULIUS WESTON'S DILEMMA.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY FREDERICK E. BURNHAM.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

JULIUS Weston was a detective in the employ of one of the largest secret service bureaus of the East. Such being the case it is not at all strange that one Saturday evening he was suddenly detailed to shadow two suspected forgers and counterfeiters who had for some reason best known to themselves shown to the city two clean pair of heels.

The detective managed to send a brief note to his wife, stating he was about to take the limited, west bound express and might not return for a fortnight. That was the last that any one knew of the detective. The express met with an accident, a dozen passengers were killed and more than two score wounded. It was generally conceded that the detective was one of three individuals who were so fearfully mangled as to be unrecognizable.

Years passed and Julius Weston's wife died and was buried in the churchyard. A marble slab marked her resting place and the inscription told the passerby that Julius Weston likewise had passed away.

Julius Weston was busy laying his plans while he journeyed on the trail of the fugitives. Suddenly he was thrown violently forward in his seat, and the next instant there came a terrific crash, the forward car telescoping his own, completely demolishing it, and killing outright a number of its occupants, and wounding many others. The detective was among those injured.

The next thing that Weston realized after that frightful crash, he was lying on a cot in a hospital with his head bandaged. He looked about him in a wondering sort of a way, quite unable to understand what it all meant. The doctor asked him his name, but the poor fellow, try as he would, could not recall it, nor, indeed, anything connected with his past. It seemed to him as though he had just been born into the busy world.

One morning he was walking down one of the side streets of the city when his attention was called to two flashily dressed young men who were sauntering along just ahead of him. Something about the young men half awoke a train of recollection. Scarcely knowing why, Weston followed the strangers about from place to place, an irresistible desire seizing him to shadow the men, if need be, to the end of the earth. Finally he located their hotel and learned that they had been stopping there for several weeks. They spent money freely and intermingled with the wealthy young men of the city. The clerk at the desk said that they were brothers, sons of a coal baron. Why did they interest Weston?

Money! Fraud! Counterfeit!

Again and again did those words ring in his ears as he followed the two men about the city. Their faces seemed to be a connecting link between the present and the past, yet a mist ever hung between which he could not penetrate.

One morning he made a fool of himself, as he said. Growing desperate he called at the police station and told the captain that there were two rascals stopping at the Q—— Hotel and he wanted warrants issued for their arrest.

"Your proof?"

Julius Weston was confounded. He looked at the chief blankly for a moment and bowing his head, left the office deeply chagrined.

The chief smiled and remarked that another crank had materialized. He detailed a "shadow" to follow the stranger and presently the trail led the detective to the hotel where the two suspected men were stopping.

Two hours later the chief received a message from the "shadow," asking that warrants for the arrest of the Cary Brothers, notorious counterfeiters and forgers, be issued and sent without delay.

The chief wondered who the strange man was who had furnished such valuable information. He questioned him sharply, but the poor fellow could not even remember his name. The bureau soon learned that this man with no past was a marvel. The most difficult threads he followed with ease. Criminals who had long baffled the shrewdest detectives were no match for his cunning. One after another they were rounded up until the old "sleuths" were green with envy.

Constantly were things occurring which sorely troubled Weston's mind. Almost could he recall the past. Now he saw a face that brought back a forgotten incident, but ever was there a mist before it and he saw no more. The odor of a flower reminded him of a place of glad memories, yet the picture vanished ere he could complete the chain.

A peculiar dish of food brought before him a scene that appealed vividly to his mind; almost could he see those gathered about the board, and sometimes he thought he caught the sound of their voices.

Unhappy Weston! The faces he could see outlined slowly vanished with no feature distinctly visible. The voices of those who spoke never rose above a murmur. Cursing the fate that hid his past, he pursued his calling with grim determination. He could trace criminals with the keen scent of a Cuban bloodhound, but he was powerless to learn anything of his own past.

Tortured in his own mind by the conflicting emotions which gave him no rest day or night, he consulted with the leading physicians, hoping to find some relief. One and all agreed that a portion of the skull rested upon the brain, resulting in a partial paralysis, but no physician was willing to undertake the removal of the fragment of bone.

It was while passing along the street one morning that a remarkable occurrence took place. Workmen had been digging a trench and a board was thrown across for pedestrians to walk upon. Intent upon his paper, Weston walked into the pit, receiving a severe shaking up. That fall accomplished what the doctors had feared to attempt. Instantly was Weston's mind as clear as a bell.

"We're wrecked!" Those were the first words that passed Weston's lips.

"Help! Help! Help! I can't move!"

A half dozen workmen rushed to his assistance and he gazed at them in astonishment.

"Where am I? We're wrecked? I'm mad! mad! mad!"

Darting away from the astonished men, he rushed down one street and up another, firmly convinced that he had lost his reason. And it was not to be wondered at, for the last thing that he remembered was the terrible crash of the two trains and the subsequent shrieks of the wounded and dying; the next instant, so far as he was concerned, he awoke to find himself in a pit where workmen were shoveling dirt. The transition was too sudden. For a time Weston was indeed crazy. Gradually, however, he grew calmer and looked about him. All seemed strange. He remembered nothing of the city, save in a hazy sort of a way, similar to his recollection of his past prior to his fall.

He asked the name of the city and learned that he was more than one thousand miles from the scene of the disaster which had clouded his mind. He stepped into a telegraph office, thinking to wire his wife that he had received no serious injury in the collision.

"What's this?" asked the operator, noting the message and eyeing Weston sharply.

"Limited express wrecked? There has been no wreck that I know of. What are you thinking about, old man?"

"No wreck?" said Weston, feebly, turning away. "I guess I'm not feeling just right."

At the depot he learned that a train left for the East within a half-hour. Buying a through-ticket he was presently on his way. All that day and the following night he traveled. Everything seemed strange to him. The papers told him astounding things. Who was President Garfield who had been assassinated? The last president that he remembered anything about was President Lincoln.

Seeing his face in the glass for the first time since his fall, he was surprised to find himself strangely changed. His former jet-black hair and moustache were now snow-white.

At last he arrived, but how wonderfully metamorphosed was everything. Where had been vacant fields, stood trim houses. Where formerly were dwelling-houses, now great structures of granite and brick had been reared. Pausing here and there as he wended his way homeward he wiped the perspiration from his brow.

There he stood! He knew the neat little cottage where he had lived with his family those happy years. The same vine was growing over the door and apple-trees shaded the porch, only they seemed much larger than when he went away. Somehow a growing distrust of his own senses was fast taking possession of him. He wondered if his wife and children had likewise changed since he had left them. For an instant he hesitated before opening the door, then, summoning all his courage, threw it open, and was surprised to find himself face to face with a strange man who demanded his business.

"Business?" he shouted, seizing the man and hurling him down the steps. "Business? what is your business in my home?"

Now he noticed for the first time the children who had been playing about the house. They were about the age of his own, but they were not his children. The woman who now stood where the stranger was when he had laid violent hands upon him, was not his wife. No, she was brandishing a chair high above her head, the personification of the Furies. Goaded on by the sight, Weston leaped at her, dragging her from the house, and tumbling the children into the street.

Rushing in, Weston banged the door behind him and turning the key in the lock was master of the situation. From room to room he hastened calling his wife and offspring by name, begging them to return to him. But they came not, and no answer did he hear save the echo of his own voice and the growing uproar in the street.

The police had arrived and were battering down the door, when, enraged to the last degree, Weston threw open the front door and shaking his fist in the faces of those before him, he fairly flew from the house, successfully eluding his pursuers. Two hours later he appeared at the office where formerly the secret-service had its quarters. A dapper little man stepped up to him and demanded his business.

"I have no business, sir," said he, sadly, "but I would that I could meet with one whom I know. I left this office but yesterday on the trail of two counterfeiters, and now when I return, my family is gone, and my home is gone, and my friends I see no more, and I myself am changed."

"You are a bit off, sir," said the little man, motioning Weston to the door. "We are busy to-day, kindly disturb us no longer."

"I will trouble you no longer, or any one else, for that matter," said Weston, simply. "I know that I am not myself. I am some one else. I know not what has come over me."

To the churchyard Weston wandered, intent upon finding some quiet nook where he could reason with himself. A marble slab attracted his attention and he read the inscription.

JULIUS WESTON, DIED MAY 2, 1864.

REBECCA WESTON, DIED JULY 18, 1880.

That was too much; he staggered backward with his hand clasping his forehead. His wife was dead, and he was dead, and yet he was alive and staring at his own gravestone.

The sexton paused in his work, hearing the report of a revolver. Boys were forbidden to discharge fire-arms within the churchyard, and he hastened to the spot where he saw the puff of smoke. But no boys fled at his approach. Fallen upon the little mound, his hand clutching the still smoking revolver, was a middle-aged man, his eyes closed in death.

The Voodoo Queen of Cagayan.

A Story of the Philippine Islands.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MAX BENNETT THRASHER.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

SENOR, the Voodoo Queen waits outside to see you."

The half-breed Spanish-Moro servant announced the arrival of this royal visitor with a mixture of awe and fear which was impressive. Evidently she was to him, at least, a personage not to be treated lightly.

"What next?" thought I to myself.

I had been only three days in my new position as diplomatic and military representative of the United States in Cagayan, one of the Philippine Islands, to which I had been sent by order of the military governor at Manila.

Cagayan was once little more than a volcanic rock a few square miles in extent, but time has worn down the roughness of the cooled lava, covered it with soil, and grown so luxuriant a vegetation there that it is famous even among the riotous greenery of all this tropic country. The political situation in Cagayan was somewhat different from that in most of the islands. The inhabitants are almost without exceptions Moros, who had never taken kindly to the Spanish rule, and in one way or another had managed to remain almost independent. This hatred for the Spanish, though, had seemed to prepossess them in favor of the Americans, and about the time the native disturbances about Manila had been at their highest an envoy had come from Cagayan to Admiral Dewey assuring him of the loyalty of this island to the Americans. As a result it was thought well to open communication with them, and for this purpose I was sent down with a squad of soldiers. One of the gunboats which was to make a cruise through the Sulu Sea took us to Cagayan, and leaving us there was to call on her way back for dispatches, or for our return if we did not find it advisable to stay.

To tell the truth I did not feel at all sure there would be any of us left to send dispatches, or to return, so treacherous and unreliable had the natives in many of the islands proved. So far, however, everything had been quiet, and apparently peaceable.

Who the Voodoo Queen could be I did not know, nor could I guess her errand. My servant when asked, although he had talked like a parrot about everybody and everything else, was strangely silent.

"Show her in," I said.

She came, and quite involuntarily I found myself starting to rise and to say, "Be seated, Madam."

And yet she was only a black woman, blacker than the majority of the Moros, tall, of large frame without being stout, and with iron gray hair which was pushed in heavy waves back from her face beneath a dead-black turban embroidered with cabalistic designs in yellow. The very atmosphere surrounding some people commands respect. This black savage possessed that peculiar attribute as completely as any person I have ever seen.

"Senor," said she, to my surprise speaking excellent Spanish. "I ask friendship for myself and the people of this island. They are a simple people, and rightly treated can be ruled as easily as children."

I assured her that our only wish was to give the people of all the islands the fairest treatment possible. Our interview lasted for half an hour. Then she said:

"Senor, I thank you. We are friends. You speak for your great ruler, of whom we know so little. I can answer for my people. I leave proof with you."

When she had come into the room I noticed she had brought with her an odd-shaped basket of closely woven rushes. Now, unfastening the cover of this basket she reached in, and to my horror drew out, squirming and coiling about her arm, an enormous black snake which, to my greater horror, she placed upon the floor, where, hissing venomously it coiled itself, holding its head a few inches above its body as if, to my eyes, getting ready to strike.

Wild tales of mysterious murders wrought by poisoned snake fangs flashed through my mind, and I was almost shouting for help when I saw the serpent's eyes close and his head sink quietly down upon the lustrous black coil of his body. His mistress had held out a hand over him, and this had been the result.

"Senor," said she once more, "mi serpiente a su disposicion," (My snake is yours.)

Which saying she walked out, leaving snake and basket behind. I saw her through an open window, if one may give that name to the portion of the wall of a Philippine house which swings up to admit light and air, cross the square before the house and walk away with stately carriage toward the forest. I sat and watched the snake, afraid to move. Finally I shouted for Mateo, the servant.

At the sound of my voice the reptile opened his eyes, and I felt sure glared at me.

Mateo came, his face even yet awestruck. I suspect that he and various of his fellows had watched the whole interview through cracks in the bamboo wall of the house.

"Can't you get that thing out of here?" I asked.

"Oh, Senor. Never. The snake of the Voodoo Queen is a blessing. See, Senor. Her sign is on it."

He pointed to three white marks on the reptile's black neck, which did look as if three fingers had been laid there.

Mateo's tongue was loose enough now that he felt sure the Queen had looked favorably upon me. He told me she was not a native of the island, but was said to be the child of a Negro king, years before brought as a slave to the islands. Just how she had been freed no one knew. Some said she had killed her master and fled from the island which had been her home, to Cagayan, where she had gone into the forest to live, surrounded by a truly awful bodyguard of snakes and powerful conjure-charms. The natives had come to have a respect for her skill as a doctress, and a fear for her occult powers which had made her more their ruler than the representatives of Spain had ever been.

While we talked the big black snake uncoiled himself and slowly glided out of the room, across the veranda, and under the house. Unlike the native houses, which are almost invariably perched on stout posts which raise them from five to twenty feet above the ground, this government house, for I had taken possession of the building which my Spanish predecessors had vacated, was raised not more than two feet from the ground, so that his snake-ship had a commodious and convenient retreat under it.

"He is gone," said I, not, I acknowledge, without relief.

"No," said Mateo. "He never will leave where his mistress placed him."

And he did not. While I was there he never left the house. Sometimes he would not come out from under the house for a day or two, and then again I would wake in the morning to find him coiled neatly on the floor in the middle of my bedroom. We never had a rat, or scorpion, or vermin of any kind after he came, a blessing which only one who has lived in a hot country can appreciate.

One day Mateo came in and found me watching the big black fellow twist across the floor.

"Ah, Senor," said he, "it is not always the Queen's snakes are like this."

"How so?" I inquired.

The half-breed hesitated, as if he had said more than he had intended to say, and it was only when I had spoken more sharply to him than I had ever done before that he told me what he meant.

"One, two, three, four years ago," said he, counting back upon his fingers, the Spanish sent a ruler here to collect the tax-money, who did not make friends with the Queen. He called her a 'she-devil,' and after a time forbade the people to go to her for 'conjure-medicine' when they were sick. So after that, when he was here, they could only go at night.

"The next year he came again, and the next. This third time he brought a man with him who said he was a doctor from some great school in Madrid, sent out to gather animals, and birds, and plants, and snakes, though I see not what he could want of them. He brought guns, and ropes, and bottles of queer smelling water which would make you go to sleep. I know, because one day when they had both gone to the forest I smelled of a bottle of it and when I woke I was on the floor, and the bottle was broken beside me.

"Most the doctor man asked for a python, but could not find one. Then it was that some one who loved not the Voodoo Queen told the ruler that the Queen had at her home in the forest a python four times as long as the ruler was tall. Upon which the ruler sent word to the Queen to kill the snake and bring to him.

"'Does a mother slay her children at the bidding of a stranger?' was the answer she sent back.

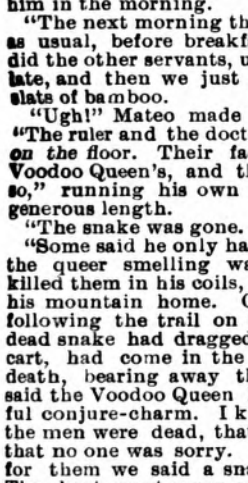
"The next day the ruler and the doctor man took guns and a bottle of the queer smelling water, and went into the forest, to the home of the Queen, who lives in a cave. When they came back at night they brought a dead python with them, loaded upon a cart drawn by carabaos, (water buffalo.) The snake was in length, as had been told, full four times the height of the ruler, so long in fact, that when loaded on the cart his tail dragged upon the ground. They left him in a corner of the room, the doctor man saying he would skin him in the morning.

"The next morning the ruler did not call me as usual, before breakfast. I waited, and so did the other servants, until the time was very late, and then we just peeped in between the slats of bamboo.

"Ugh!" Mateo made a gesture of disgust. "The ruler and the doctor man were both dead on the floor. Their faces were black as the Voodoo Queen's, and their tongues stuck out, so," running his own tongue out to all its generous length.

"The snake was gone.

"Some said he only had been put to sleep by the queer smelling water, and waking, had killed them in his coils, and then gone back to his mountain home. Others said his mate, following the trail on the ground where the dead snake had dragged behind the carabaos cart, had come in the night to avenge his death, bearing away the body. Still others said the Voodoo Queen had wrought a powerful conjure-charm. I know not, I only know the men were dead, that we buried them, and that no one was sorry. When the boat came for them we said a snake had killed them. The boat went away and no other men have come until you."



I passed no more nights in the bedroom of the government house, but that very day hired the loftiest house I could find, set on posts a good fifteen feet from the ground. I slept with the jalousies down, too, feeling satisfied with what fresh air came in through the cracks of the bamboo wall. The Queen's snakes might be of different kinds, and come on different errands, but I would take no chances.

And when the gunboat put in with word that she had been intercepted by a cruiser bearing orders for us all to return to Manila at once, I was not sorry to leave Cagayan, to which, so far as I know, no other white man has gone to dispute, or share, the rule of the Voodoo Queen.

HARVEY BAXTER'S SECRET.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MISS C. D. GILBERT.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"SHE'S not the wife for him."

This was the verdict of all the women and all the men, too, when "splendid Harvey Baxter" took "frivolous Maud Wheeler" for his wife. But if Harvey were dissatisfied, he gave no sign, and certainly Maud was as well contented as it was in her nature to be.

About two years after the wedding, Mrs. Huntley, who had been one of the most disapproving of Harvey's friends, received a visit from an old school friend, Mrs. Waller, and her daughter Margaret; and a part of the conversation which took place as they drove about town one afternoon was as follows:

"I want to ask you about Harvey Baxter," said Mrs. Waller. "It was when we were visiting you before we went to Europe two years ago that he was married after a short engagement. Everybody was astonished and said that Maud Wheeler wasn't half good enough for him."

"Everybody was mistaken," Mrs. Huntley replied. "Maud Wheeler was a thousand times too good for him for he turned out to be a scamp."

"What! Harvey Baxter a scamp!" exclaimed Mrs. Waller. "I thought he was considered to be the soul of honor."

"And so he was. He would have been trusted with untold gold by any one who knew him. Nevertheless he is working out a ten years' sentence in prison.

"After their marriage Harvey Baxter took his wife to Taylor's hotel, for Maud did not wish to have the care of housekeeping; neither was she willing to live with her father in the suburbs. She had been motherless from early childhood and had grown up selfish and exacting. Some people considered her even unprincipled. Hence the greater wonderment that such a man as Harvey was supposed to be should marry her. My own opinion was that he suddenly became aware that she was a woman and not the child he had always considered her (for he was fifteen years older than she, and was her father's friend), and that she expected it of him. I thought at the time that he had no sense of honor. But I am digressing.

"One morning quite a sensation was created in the hotel by the disappearance of a set of rubies belonging to one of the regular boarders. The case was put into the hands of a detective but no clew could be found. From time to time other articles of value were missed, and finally all the house servants were dismissed. For a time all was quiet: then several articles disappeared in one day. The next morning a chamber maid found a diamond ring on the floor of Harvey Baxter's room near his trunk. Supposing that it belonged in the room, she picked it up intending to put it in a safe place; but noticing that the initials inside were not those of either Harvey or his wife, she put it back where she had found it, and at once reported to the office. She was sent to her own room and not allowed to leave it until an officer had been summoned and Harvey Baxter's room searched, which was done in the presence of himself and his wife.

"Maud was much agitated during the proceedings, and when the articles were found and she heard her husband's confession, she fainted in his arms. One little diamond pin bearing the initials O.H. has never been found, and the thief could not be induced to give any account of it."

"But Harvey Baxter did not take the things!" exclaimed Margaret Waller, her eyes gleaming with indignation, "the real thief put them in his trunk of course."

"That is what we all should have thought, my dear, had he not confessed. But when he found that he was caught, he owned that he was the thief."

"Harvey Baxter a thief, and by his own confession!" The girl's cheek paled then flushed.

"I am sure he is innocent," she said quietly and spoke no more on the subject.

"I had forgotten that you and Harvey were excellent friends at one time," said Mrs. Huntley; "perhaps I should not have told the story. However, there is a little more to tell."

They had indeed been excellent friends, Margaret Waller and Harvey Baxter; but if at the time of the marriage, Margaret had entertained any sentiment other than that shared by all Harvey's friends, she had in no way betrayed it.

"Harvey would never tell how he obtained the articles nor why he took them," Mrs. Huntley continued after a pause. "He certainly had no need of money, for he had a comfortable property and a large income from his business. Fortunately he has no near relatives.

"Maud went back to her father's house. He passed away a month ago. She died last week of a broken heart. She had the sympathy of every one, including those who most disapproved of her in her prosperity. Poor Maud!"

"Hers is indeed a sad history," said Mrs. Waller. "Is it known whether or not her husband showed any feeling when he received the news of her death?"

"It is reported that he was much affected. He and Maud had kept up a correspondence in spite of the father's wishes to the contrary."

The conversation drifted into other channels and the subject was not renewed that day; but the girl with the tender grey eyes, who sat on the front seat of the carriage—well, never mind.

The next morning Mrs. Huntley in a state of excitement entered the room in which her guests were sitting.

"Here is great news!" she exclaimed. "Harvey Baxter is innocent and is coming home."

"What! Why! How!" exclaimed Mrs. Waller; while Margaret sat with clinched hands and a strange light in her eyes.

"It seems," said Mrs. Huntley, "that in her last hours Maud put into her uncle's hand a letter which she charged him as a sacred duty to have published. Here is the morning paper, and this is the letter:

"'To the Public: I feel that death is near and before it is too late, I wish to repair, as far as possible, a cruel wrong.

"'I call God to witness that every word which I write here is true. Harvey Baxter is innocent. I alone am guilty of the crimes which he is supposed to have committed, and for which he is now suffering imprisonment.

"'My object in stealing was to get more money to waste than the very liberal allowance granted me before marriage by my father, after marriage by my husband.

"'The habit of appropriating what belonged to others was contracted in my girlhood. I first took money from my father's drawer to meet some extravagance which my allowance would not cover. The habit grew upon me, until my only thought was to get all I could without being detected. Many servants were dismissed on account of the thefts I had committed. This did not disturb me.

"'The most of my thieving at Taylor's hotel was carried on during the absence of my fellow-boarders; but in a few cases almost under their eyes. Generally I obtained permission (under one pretext or another, to sit by their windows if they were pleasanter than mine, sometimes to consult their books of reference) to occupy their rooms for a time while they were absent; then I made the most of my opportunity to ascertain the whereabouts of their jewels, generally carrying away one or two articles. On several occasions I have appropriated small articles from jewel cases left open on the dressing-cases, even when the owners sat within six feet of me.

"'I had no conscientious scruples whatever. On the contrary, I felt some pride in the skill to which I had attained. But I feared detection and punishment. This is why I concealed the articles in my husband's trunk. I expected to dispose of them before he should have occasion to open it; but I could never get the courage to pawn them. At the time of the search, when the trunk was opened I was almost beside myself. I grasped my husband's arm and whispered in his ear, "Harvey, save me!" He answered, "I will!" and I knew that at any cost he would keep his word. When the missing articles were brought to light, he turned to the officer and said, "I give myself up. I am guilty." Then I fainted.

"'The diamond pin was concealed, at the time of the search, under the trimming of my gown. Now it can be found under the covering of the red plush chair in my sitting-room.

"'Of my sins of theft and the greater one of allowing an innocent person to suffer in my stead, I have nothing further to say. As to punishment, it cannot be worse than the torture which I have experienced for the last fifteen months, nor greater than I deserve. May God have mercy on my soul.'"

MAUD BAXTER.

During the excited discussion which followed the reading of this letter, Margaret Waller slipped from the room. Her face was pale, but in her eye was a peculiar light which never could have shone there, had not the innocence of Harvey Baxter been brought to light.

Two years afterward as Harvey stood by his own fireside looking into the soft gray eyes of his wife, he whispered:

"Margaret, did you ever believe——"

"Never Harvey," Margaret replied, and this was the only reference to the painful subject ever made between them.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

BLOUSES are not dead. Once again I would reiterate this piece of information, knowing it will be hailed with delight by those who were once their devotees. There are many, many models being worked out on most persuasive lines by annexing the flat, rounded basque. So very fanciful has the blouse become that only a small amount of material is needed for the body, the tucked sleeves are usually of chiffon or net, as is the guimpe or vest; while for stock and belt, cross-wise folds of mirror velvet (no other appeals to me in the least), are the most effective and usual finish.

The world of fashion is running a mad race, indeed, we might almost call it the whirl of fashion. Vogues follow upon one another's heels so closely we barely grasp the full meaning of a new venture than something newer and more startling is thrust upon us attracting all our serious attention.

However, all aspirants to a fashionable figure must curtail every pronounced curve or flare, into a graceful, symmetrical length which trails the floor to the space of several inches, both behind and at the sides, and as long at the front as the wearer can possibly endure without constant tripping. Skirts of draped character in some quarters show forth a tendency to claim first place and are really fascinating to a degree. A smart model has the upper straight skirt lifted at the left hip well toward the back, the fullness arranged in box pleats fastened down by a row of small buttons. The skirt known as the "shawl" pattern is becoming very popular; to wear them with good effect, however, one must be tall and slim. Certainly they can be very, very nice, exceedingly becoming, infinitely charming. To make one successfully you need a good pattern, and, if you have a certain knowledge of dressmaking, you can provide yourself with a shapely and fashionable skirt. The upper portion of this skirt fits closely around the hips and hangs in loose graceful points at the front and back; it might almost be called a polonaise, a word which takes us back to visions of a strange-looking, and, to our modern eyes, hideous gown worn years ago. But the polonaise of to-day is of the same material as the skirt beneath, and is really only a competent part of it. Many of the best skirts remain untrimmed; after exhausting brains and purses in all manner of trimming the best modistes are wondering if a plain, or at most, very slightly trimmed skirt is not more becoming, and so we have a host of smart untrimmed skirts, showing that the proverbial fickle woman has returned to the first love.

Buttons are used elaborately as a trimming, and buckles too, are dear to the heart of the fashionable woman. There is no limit to the number she may wear at one time. Belt buckles are now quite out of the running; we have buckles on our hats, they fasten our skirts at the back, they close our ties at the throat, they gleam among the lace and chiffon of our evening gowns, they nestle in the cozy folds of trimming on our skirts, in fact, they are ubiquitous, and the makers of buttons and buckles, have cause to thank that erratic Dame Fashion for this particular vagary. Buckles for the neck are bound to be extremely popular this summer; worn in the manner they now are, they do away largely with the tie. Any sort of ribbon desired is brought around the throat, drawing the linen collar in closely to the neck, the two parts of the buckle are separately attached to the ends of the ribbon, and it is clasped directly in front. It is a very smart and simple finish to be worn with shirt waists.

A peculiar sleeve was seen on a shirt waist of recent importation, made up of sheerest white muslin to be worn over a silk slip. This sleeve in question was wrinkled full from the shoulder to the elbow, from which point the sleeve took the form of a regular shirt sleeve finishing in a cuff at the wrist. Dressmakers in general seem to find it a great difficulty to find new and suitable finishings to the wrists of sleeves. Gown designers, however clever, both at home and abroad, seem to have a rooted dislike, or an inability to set forth new models for the hand trimming of sleeves. However all sorts of decorations, whatever is employed, still fall well over the hand. Elbow sleeves are extremely popular just now and are wonderfully effective when combined with a pretty arm.

Lace is largely employed as a trimming on summer gowns, adding to their airiness and delicacy. A charming illustration of this is shown in the sketch, "all-over" lace of a rather heavy pattern forming the lower part of the bodice, and upper portion of the skirt, of the dainty violet cashmere gown.

A second apt illustration of its use is shown in this case being black guipure applied in flat bands over dead white challie forming the gown. The use of black lace on light materials is being highly approved by the leading modistes. An especially fetching frock for summer wear is made up of grenadine, black, very lacey and open, showing sharp stripes over the foundation of white satin. The top and bottom of the skirt flounce, as well as the smart little bodice, has an edging consisting of a four inch band of white ribbed silk set off with a piping of black velvet.

Dainty indeed are the materials being made up into gowns, each of which show some distinctive feature peculiar to the season. It is no unusual thing to see a gown of white muslin made up over a foundation consisting of firstly, a skirt of white taffeta provided with ruffles all down the back, and over this a skirt of lace edged muslin, coming directly under the outside covering. The effect is very misty and pretty, especially when the outside material is sufficiently filmy.

A stunning model I have noticed was for half mourning, made up in white muslin over white silk, all its tiny ruffles bound with tiny, narrow black velvet ribbon. The bodice has a dainty trimming of black velvet ribbon arranged in tiny lover's knots.

A particularly neat sleeve for a cloth gown has a smartly draped top brought about by a lattice-work arrangement of narrow velvet ribbon. The merest suggestion of fullness occurs in the shoulder of the latest sleeves, and it is kept as flat as possible.

The Breton cap is the latest millinery novelty, and is a charming shape and one eminently well suited to the young matron or woman past her first youth. Of course the cap worn by the Breton peasant is responsible for the evolvement, the lines at the back for the most part kept intact, though in front the milliner permits the indulgence of a gentle fantasy on the theme. A very dainty example was formed of black net spangled with jet sequins, having a little hanging curtain at the back of jetted net, a large and cleverly arranged bow of burnt orange mirror velvet and tulle filling in the entire front. And this color let me tell you all, is inclined to prove a serious rival to both pink and the shaded cyclamen shades which have been quoted as chief favorites of the hour. Though to be sure, there is comfort in the reflection that the color suited to one complexion is absolutely impossible to another.

Invention of the Menu Card.

THE INVENTION of the menu card is attributed to Duke Henry of Brunswick, who was noticed by his guests at a banquet to frequently refer to a long strip of paper which lay by his plate. At last one, more curious or bolder than the rest, asked him why he did so. Duke Henry replied that the paper was a kind of program of the dishes which he had ordered his cook to prepare for the feast, and that he consulted it from time to time to see if there were any coming delicacy for which it would be well to reserve his appetite. The convenience and desirability of the idea was appreciated by the guests, and from that moment the menu card became an institution. At first it was written large, so that there was room on the table for only two copies, one at either end of the board. In dinners in medieval times this list would seem to be a necessity even more than at present, for, although dinners were then divided into courses as in modern times there was no regularity to the courses, and one never knew in an "early English" dinner, what was coming next, whether fish, flesh, fowl or sweetmeats.

To remedy squeaking shoes stand the shoe in a tin plate containing just enough turpentine to touch the inner sole without reaching the upper leather. Let it soak for a day and then dry for two days before wearing, when it will be found that the shoes are not only noiseless but waterproof, and will wear much longer than without this application. Another method of breaking a shoe of squeaking is to bore a hole with a small gimlet through the inside sole near the instep. This lets out the air between the soles, and so stops the squeak. Two little slips of rubber are now often fastened across the sole of a baby's shoes at the ball of the foot to prevent the tendency to slip back which so troubles master baby when he makes his first efforts at waiking.

Geologists say that the earth is at least 21,000,000 years old; that is, it is that long since the soil first formed. It is also estimated that man appeared 100,000 years ago.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

BUT a few years ago it would hardly have been expected that any happenings in a house such as is here pictured would call attention to it from every part of civilized Europe, and particularly would this have been true had it been added that the hut was in a far-off island of the South Pacific. And yet to-day events are transacting around this one house, which is that of the German consul at Apia, Samoa, which threatens the peace of three of the great powers, United States, England and Germany.

Most of our readers will remember that some years ago there was international trouble caused by the conduct of the native population in the Samoan islands. There was a civil war over the possession of the throne between two rivals. The same three powers were interested then as now, but the subject is particularly remembered from the fact that a number of vessels from the three navies were there and were overtaken in the harbor by a fearful storm which wrecked several of the warships, among them two American vessels. It was an appalling disaster and was only brightened by the brave heroism of the sailors generally. Then as now Britain and America were united and Germany on the other side; but after a long diplomatic discussion one of the rival claimants of the throne was recognized and a new government established under a tripartite arrangement of the Powers by which their respective consuls acted as a sort of executive council, while an American was made Chief Justice.

The arrangement has worked fairly well, although scarcely satisfactorily, until recently when further trouble came from the uprising of a band of rebels, who desired to place another claimant on the throne, Mataafa. Under the agreement the matter was left to the Chief Justice, who reported against him. It is said that Mataafa was supported by the German consul and Apia was taken by the insurgents. At this time there were no American ships there and the single British man-of-war was actively engaged in protecting British and Americans alike. The cruiser Philadelphia commanded by Admiral Kautz of our navy soon arrived and a conference was held upon her by the consuls. Orders were given for the dispersion of Mataafa's army; but he, evidently relying on German aid continued in rebellion.

These troubles soon took a new turn, which resulted in a bombardment of several towns by the Philadelphia and the British ships Porpoise and Royalist, which lasted intermittently for eight days. A number of the allied sailors were killed or injured; but no estimate of the native loss has been made.

As Mataafa and his chiefs forming a provisional government continued to defy the treaty after the Philadelphia's arrival, Admiral Kautz, the consuls and interested parties resolved to dismiss them; but they were upheld and incited in rebellion by Herr Rose, the German consul, and finally opened fire on our ships as above stated. The Americans and British since then have been fighting together splendidly.

As soon as this news reached New Zealand it was telegraphed all over the world from Auckland. It created wild excitement and another war seemed probable; but the unbending attitude of England and America brought serious second thought and after the usual diplomatic exchanges, it has practically been decided to retain the present agreement until a commission of one high officer from each government, shall visit the islands and examine into the condition of the surroundings and lay out a plan for the future. It is to be regretted that the support of the German consul, Herr Rose, has encouraged the insurrection. Soon after the crowning of the new king, Tanu, under the English and American support, a large force of American and British sailors were ambushed while on an exploring expedition. They fought an overwhelming force of natives but escaped with the loss of a few officers and men. President McKinley here as in the Philippines seems anxious to have a strong native government in whatever shape may be most satisfactory for the island inhabitants.

It may be interesting for COMFORT's readers to know that the Samoan islands are not valuable on account of commerce but of their importance as the sites of future coaling and naval stations. It is a group having an aggregate territory of some 1700 square miles, and a population of about 36,000 people, of whom about 200 are British subjects, 125 Germans, 25 French and about the same number of Americans, with a sprinkling of other nations; the rest of the population is Polynesian. We have devoted considerable space to a matter now practically closed up; but it is one of the trivial incidents that often bring on great wars, although of themselves insignificant; and because as Americans we must now accustom ourselves to read and study about distant countries which must be more or less directly controlled by our own country now one of the great powers of the world.

GEN. LLOYD WHEATON.

At the present time there is little to say of Cuba. The administration as we narrated last month sent $3,000,000 to pay off the Cuban soldiers. The Cuban assembly, a sort of self-constituted provisional government denounced Gomez as a traitor and removed him from command of the Cuban army because he had used his good office to bring about this settlement. Unfortunately for them they had to deal with the inflexible power of Gen. Brooke who refused to distribute the money excepting on his own terms. As to the assembly it debated and resolved daily until it adjourned; but no one seems to have taken it very seriously nor does the average newspaper reader know what it all means. On the whole it may be said Cuban affairs are satisfactory. As to Porto Rico our commission has returned full of praises for the rapid progress being made under American rule. Notwithstanding some slight jealousies there seems to be no doubt that Porto Rico is fast becoming Americanized and in a satisfactory way.

Though hardly to be classed as one of our possessions as our title would indicate, the affairs of China are now of intense interest to our readers on account of our prominent position in the East. The demands of Italy for a harbor and coaling station at San Mun, which caused such a commotion in Europe a month ago, now seems to be in a fair way to be acceded to. It is understood that Italy asks a ninety-nine year lease of San Mun Bay, together with certain islands and railroad and mining concessions covering the larger part of the province of Che-Kiang; although the Chinese foreign office refused at first, the attitude of Great Britain renders it probable that the demands will be granted. It seems as if this will greatly hasten the partition of China.

The newspapers for the past month have been full of the valorous deeds of our soldiers in the East. So long as the treaty was not ratified the natives were in rebellion against Spain and the Americans were confined to Manila proper. With the ratification of peace the Filipinos become rebels against the authority of the United States. Under this status offensive operations were commenced and there has been a continuous campaign for a month. The losses to the Filipinos have been tremendous and their capital, Malalos, fell. Everywhere the rebels have been defeated but they have great advantages and in guerilla fighting, to which this war will finally descend, they will be able to make quite a long fight. Meantime, it seems probable that President McKinley will have to call for more volunteers as large numbers of troops have to be withdrawn for garrisons in captured islands and cities. Gen. Lloyd Wheaton has made an enviable record in the campaign and shown himself a leading general.

The proclamation of the Philippine Commission (which was sent by President McKinley to ascertain the exact condition of the islands and the people, and has been at Manila for the past month observing the situation and studying the conditions of the situation), has been distributed. The high character of the gentlemen comprising this Commission is ample guarantee that whatever report is made will be the result of careful study and the most judicial decision. The men who form the Commission are expert students, and men who have in public and private life been constantly connected with the affairs of America in China and the East. On the fourth of April, after the fall of the Filipino rebel capital, Malolos, the proclamation of the Philippine Commission was issued in English, Spanish and Tagalmano.

The preamble recites the cession by treaty of the Philippine Islands to the United States, and refers to the appointment of the Commission, assuring the people of the cordial good will and fraternal feeling of President McKinley and the American people; and asserts that the object which the United States government apart from the fulfillment of its solemn obligations has assumed toward the family of nations by the assumption of this sovereignty over the islands, is the well being, prosperity and happiness of the Filipino people and their elevation and advancement to a position among the civilized nations of the world, which the President believes will be best brought about by the cultivation of letters, science and the liberal and practical arts; by the enlargement of intercourse with foreign nations, the expansion of industrial pursuits by trade and commerce; by the multiplication and improvement of the means of internal communications; and by the development of the resources of this great archipelago. But unfortunately the pure motives of the American government towards the people have been misinterpreted to some of the inhabitants of certain islands; and in consequence the friendly forces have been openly attacked. The proclamation, after arguing the needs of the Filipinos and that they can best be conserved by submission to the American government, guarantees to spread peace and happiness among the people, with rightful freedom to accustom them to free self government, encourage domestic aspirations, sentiments and ideas, which are the promise of patriotism and fruitful national development. In conclusion it is stated that the Commission will visit the Philippine provinces to ascertain the enlightened native opinion as to the forms of government adapted to the people, and conformable with their traditions and ideals, asking leading representative men to meet the Commission and to consult the wishes and secure the advice and co-operation of the people.

The proclamation proper contains eleven articles declaring America's intentions, which commences with the fact that the supremacy of the United States must and will be enforced throughout every part of the archipelago. Liberty and self-government is promised; the civil rights of the Filipinos are guaranteed and protected, as well as religious freedom; honest and effective civil service promises the collection and application of the revenues on a sound and economical basis with honest fiscal administration; reduction of taxation; future speedy and effective administration of justice without delay or corruption; concentration of the roads, railroads, and other means of communication and transportation; development of foreign trade, commerce, and industrial pursuits; effective provision for elementary schools; and reforms in every department of the government and the people themselves.

Speaking of the proclamation, Dr. Schurman, President of the Commission, says: "The Filipinos have been asking unceasingly, 'What do you propose to do for us?'" The proclamation answers the question and should satisfy them. Col. Charles Denby, former Minister to China, and a member of the present Commission said: "It is the most important proclamation since the Declaration of Independence." This proclamation has been distributed in all parts of the islands accessible to American troops, and has been received with great favor by the native Filipinos.

As might have been expected of the gallant ship which has proven such a record breaker, the Oregon swept into Manila at full speed on the evening of March 18th just as the sun went down. Notwithstanding her long voyage around the Horn and her quick flight from Hawaii, Admiral Dewey was able to cable that she arrived fit for immediate duty. It is to be regretted that the appropriation necessary for the immediate laying of a submarine telegraph from San Francisco to Honolulu was omitted from the bill when reported back to Congress from the conference committee. This cable and the Nicaraguan canal are of the greatest necessity to this country; but through opposition of certain members of both branches, Congress failed to make the necessary appropriation of money for these two great projects. They are certain to come later, but are necessary now, and the people of this country desire their early completion.

HAVE YOU WEAK LUNGS?

Every Sufferer from Lung Weakness, Consumption, Asthma, Catarrh or Bronchitis Can Be Cured.

Nearly everybody you meet will regard it as a kind of insult to be asked if they have weak lungs. All seem to have a solid faith in the soundness of their own breathing machine. In cases of trouble they will admit there is a "heavy cold," "a touch of bronchitis," or even "a spell of asthma," but as to weak or unsound lungs, never, NEVER. Even the poor consumptive, who scarcely speaks without coughing, whose cheeks are wasted, hollow and bear the hectic flush of doom, will assure you with glistening eyes that his cold is on the mend and he will be all right when the weather changes.

It is simply terrible to think how far we may be guilty by our indifference to the lung troubles of those near and dear to us. It is also a sad thought that we may hug a delusion as to our own health that we only get rid of when life itself must pay the forfeit.

Nobody can afford to think lightly of lung troubles. Nobody can afford to be mistaken about their possible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them, or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them, and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease, or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU. That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly-discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. This forms a system of Four Remedies that are used simultaneously and supplement each other's curative action. It cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption and every other ailment of the pulmonary region. It destroys every germ that can affect the respiratory system, and even in advanced stages of lung trouble positively arrests the tubercular growth, while it also builds up the patient so that his system is enabled to throw off scrofula, rheumatism, catarrh and other wasting diseases.

Thousands of cured cases already prove these claims. Thousands of grateful people bless the discovery.

The Doctor wants everybody to know the surprising merits of his system. He has arranged to give a free treatment (Four Preparations) to all sufferers. Full instructions for use accompany each treatment.

RUBENS DANTE TASSO MURILLO ANGELO RAPHAEL

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE subject of sofa cushions and covers for same, is always an interesting one, for we all know how prone they are to soiling, fading, wearout and otherwise making themselves anything but a thing of beauty,—and that a sofa pillow that is soiled or has seen its best days is an eyesore to every dainty woman. And yet, when you need from one to two dozen of these charming accessories, how hard it is to keep them always in perfect condition.

White China silk is perhaps the best, coolest, and in every way the most desirable of materials for cushion covers,—owing to its perfect cleansing qualities and its durability, but one doesn't want all the covers made of it.

A very handsome pillow cover was recently made from a light shade of blue art linen and decorated with drawn work. A border three inches in depth was drawn all around the pillow, at a distance of three inches from the outer edge. The threads were not drawn entirely across each side, but to within three inches of the edge, thus bringing all the drawn work within an exact square. At the corners of this square, which of course would be left entirely open, quite a solid form is to be worked. This may be a spider-web stitch, or any similar form which fills in a square well. The drawn threads on each side may be worked with as simple or with as elaborate a stitch as the worker chooses to employ. The work is to be done with a dark shade of blue silk which forms a pretty contrast to the light blue of the art linen. The pillow is to be made up over any chosen contrasting color, and finished with a ruffle of the art linen, or with a large cord. The cords are newer than the ruffles, and are very much liked. They are as large as the finger, and come in white and colors. The one chosen for this pillow may be of either the light or dark blue. The finished pillow is very handsome.

A second pillow, while simpler to work and requiring less knowledge of elaborate stitches, is very effective and dainty. It is made from the checked linen which is used as a foundation for so many pretty pillow covers. But while the foundation material is not new the method of working is different from any heretofore seen, and the effect is much like that of drawn work when seen at a short distance. The pillow described was of red and white checks, but of course any preferred color may be used instead of the red, as the linen comes in blue, yellow and green, each in combination with white. The piece of linen chosen was in even checks, each about one-half an inch square, and all the work was done upon the solid red blocks. The Battenburg thread is used for working as this is of sufficient size to show effectively, and produces the lacelike effect which gives the pillow its charm. Work the first solid red square with a Greek cross in the Battenburg thread. Start from the middle of the check and carry the thread to the outer edge of one side and to within one-fourth of the length of the side from the right-hand corner. Go back to the center and make the corresponding line from there to within the same distance from the left-hand corner. Next carry the thread across the edge between the ends of these two stitches. This forms one of the four sides of the cross. Repeat the form, making it each time from the center to one of the sides of the block or check, and the result will give the Greek cross, outlined in white on the red. In the next red check make a spider web stitch. To do this cross the check from corner to corner, and from side to side, making eight lines radiating from the center. Bring the needle through from beneath in the middle, and pass the thread around the center weaving it under and over the radiating threads. As there are an even number of threads it will be necessary to pass the needle under or over two each time the circle is completed, in order that each succeeding circle may alternate with the last. Continue this weaving until the check is about half covered with the web, then draw the thread through to the wrong side and fasten. Alternate the Greek cross and the spider web on the red checks, both up and down and across, until the cover is completed. The pillow is to be made up with a ruffle of the checked linen, or with a double ruffle of plain red under plain white. The latter better carries out the plan of the pillow cover, as when completed it looks like drawn work over a red foundation. This ruffle may be continuous, or it may be made in four parts, leaving the corners open. The latter is the newer style. The hem of the ruffles may be feather-stitched, using red on the white ruffle. Even a nicer finish is given by hemstitching the white ruffle, thus showing the red beneath to better advantage, and making the whole pillow especially dainty.

Cord edges are very popular for many styles of pillows, and are taking the place of ruffles to a great extent. A novel finish was recently given a dainty pillow with especially good effect. A puff of the goods was set in all around when the back and front were put together. This puff was just large enough to draw the large finishing cord through, and formed a full casing for it. By this means the edge had a solid roll effect, closely shirred. A piece of white cotton rope could be used in place of the finishing cord quite as well if it is to be drawn through a puff as just described.

Jewel embroidery on dotted muslin is one of the simplest forms of embroidery, and in its very simplicity lies much of its charm. It can be done by anyone familiar with the use of the needle, requires no stamped pattern, and is very inexpensive. The work is done by working with Asiatic filo silk over the dots of the muslin, completely covering each dot with closely set parallel rows of stitches. Muslin with any sized dots can be used, and whatever the size of the dot the stitches are taken from side to side, in what is known as satin stitch. The coin sized dots are more effective than the very small ones, but this is largely a matter of taste, and is determined also by the character of the article for which the embroidery is used.

A very dainty pillow cover could be made in this way. There should be an undercover of white, and then the outer should be cut to fit of the dotted muslin. Dots the size of a ten cent piece look well for a rather small square pillow, and the "quarter" dots for a full sized pillow. The upper cover of the pillow should have its dots covered with the silk, using one shade for all. The under side of the cover needs no embroidery. The pillow should be finished with a ruffle, also of the dotted muslin, but the dots of the ruffle are not to be worked. Instead turn the hem, and baste down. Then cover its edge with one row of baby ribbon of the shade of the silk used in covering the dots. Such a pillow is very dainty for the parlor, or for a young girl's room. The color of silk employed should be governed by the furnishings of the room in which it is to be placed. A very light shade of this same color may be used for the under case instead of white if preferred.

The long narrow pincushion now so much used may be made up of the dotted muslin with good effect. The covers for these cushions are five inches wide and from fourteen to eighteen inches long, eighteen being the extreme. These are made with an under cover of white or color, and with a ruffle around the four sides. The dots for this should be smaller than for the pillows; those the size of the end of a lead pencil being large enough. For the cushion you may use a single color for all the dots, or you may follow the jewel effect more closely, and embroider the dots in a variety of colors, alternating the colors so that they shall be well balanced, but not perfectly regular. If you have a few threads of different colors left from other embroidery, this is an admirable way to use them. If you buy new silks for the purpose and want to have the real jeweled effect, choose those colors which correspond with the gems as largely as possible. If an under color has been used, make a ruffle of the same to lie under the muslin ruffle, but if the foundation is of white, then a pretty finish for the cushion is made by adding a full cluster of loops of baby ribbon at one corner. Have almost as many colors of ribbon in this cluster as there are colors in your jewels, and be sure to match them nicely. Such a cushion is very bright and attractive, and yet has a dainty air which adds to the furnishing of the dresser.

The embroidered muslin may also be made up into glove and handkerchief cases, finishing the edges with a ruffle, or with a silk cord which corresponds with the embroidery in color.

Pillows for the baby's carriage may be embroidered in pale blue or pink, and an exquisite crib or carriage blanket may be made up with the muslin as an outer cover, over a delicate color or over white.

Other uses for this embroidery will be thought of by anyone accustomed to fancy work, and seldom can as good results be obtained with as little labor, while if the Asiatic filo is used the work can be washed any number of times without fading.

Odd in name, very dainty in design are the corset covers which make a part of the trousseau of the modern bride. They are called "Marguerites". All sorts of delicate fabrics are employed for them, Indian linen, nainsook, fine checked dimity, and wash silks plain or checked, are among the materials chosen. The form of the garment is very simple, and one may easily be cut without a pattern. There are but two pieces and the general design may be seen in the small diagram shown in the illustration. The Marguerite is cut wide so that it can be slipped on over the head without an opening in the front, and all that is actually made to fit is the armhole. An open insertion, called a beading, is sewed around the neck and armholes, and a dainty lace edge is sewed to the beading. A narrow ribbon is run through the beading and tied in a bow at the front of each armhole. That at the neck serves to draw the garment up after it is put on, and gives a pretty fullness about the shoulders. Some of the Marguerites come just to the waist line and are finished there with the beading and a ribbon to draw it into place, while others are made longer and have a casing at the waist line.

These are the main features of the garment, but there are endless ways of finishing and trimming them. The "Susans" are like the Marguerites in form, but are trimmed in a distinct style. The four diagonal corners of a fancy handkerchief, lace-trimmed or embroidered, are sewed to the neck of the garment so that they shall fall below the beading and lace. Two of the corners are sewed on over the shoulders and the other two across the front. Only those thus trimmed are termed "Susans."

THE LOUIS R. VEHON CO., 155-157 W. Jackson St., CHICAGO, ILL.

Some of the Marguerites are finished with one or two rows of insertion set in below the beading of the neck; others are trimmed with bows of insertion up and down the front. The trimming is always of lace, as anything else would prove too heavy for the delicate fabrics employed.

Sometimes the form of the garment is varied slightly. A French back is used with a seam down the middle. This makes the back fit closer, and takes away from the fullness across the shoulders. Still another variation is made in the front of some, for instead of cutting this in one piece like the back, it is cut in two pieces which correspond at the side to the sides of the back piece, but which extend toward the front in two long tapering points. These ends are intended to be tied together in a full, soft bow. The edges are finished with lace, and the bow not only makes a very pretty finish, but gives the necessary fullness which in the other style is imparted by drawing up the width with a ribbon.

Many young girls who enjoy doing fine handwork, keep a Marguerite on their work table ready to take up while visiting with a friend; and that a Marguerite or a Susan makes one of the most acceptable of gifts may be readily proved by consulting any woman who likes dainty lingerie.

Very elaborate indeed are the new decorations of embroidery and lace combined, which are shown in the newest table linens. These pieces are used for tables upon which bric-a-brac is placed, even more than for the dining table. For the latter they are appropriate only upon the most formal occasions. They look particularly handsome upon the polished wood of a mahogany dining table, without the usual tablecloth as an underlay.

The centerpieces are of fine linen of heavy quality, with the outer edge stamped in a Battenburg lace pattern of considerable depth. The width of the pattern depends upon the size of centerpiece, but it is always deep enough to be rich and heavy. An embroidery pattern is also stamped upon the linen, usually in sprays of flowers in their natural size, and with no attempt at conventionality. The effect is almost as though the blossom with its long stem and a few leaves had been laid upon the linen and lace with unstudied effect. The design is so placed that while the main part of it falls upon the linen, a part of the spray, perhaps a single great rose, falls on the lace. In second spray, worked on another side of the same piece, a cluster of leaves will fall over apparently, upon the heavy lace edge.

All sorts of flowers are used for embroidering these centerpieces. Among those best liked are roses, sweet peas, narcissi, and orchids. The only restriction as to choice of flowers is that those must be chosen which can be worked in their natural size, and after the choice is made the design must be a natural sketch, in order that the effect may be as described, that of a branch or cluster dropped upon the white background of linen and lace.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Spring is now fairly upon us, and the inspiration of its presence makes itself felt. New life awakes within us, new desires, new hopes, new resolves. With the coming of the bees and the birds, with the opening of the flowers and the spreading green of the trees the longing grows strong within us to be also up and doing, to break away from the treadmill of work and roam out into the world in search of the new and the beautiful. Nay, more, to make of ourselves something larger and better than we have yet become: Were it not for these moments of inspiration, which come to us, it may be, through the slightest of causes, what mere lifeless clods we should become, plodding on drearily in one interminable round, with no aspirations for anything better or nobler, until death should put an end to it all.

With these thoughts in our minds let us read, in our first letter for the month, of the noble work being accomplished in Tuskegee, Ala., to benefit the colored race, and of the earnest efforts of the colored people themselves to profit by what is offered them, and so to broaden and deepen their lives in every possible way.

"In the heart of the 'Black Belt,' at Tuskegee, Alabama, is an institution for the education and development of the colored race which has accomplished so much that it has attracted the attention of educators all over the United States. These believe that the course of instruction taught at Tuskegee will in time solve the problem which has puzzled educators and philanthropists both North and South for the past thirty years.

"Mr. Booker Washington, the founder of this school and its mainspring, was born a slave. By his own persistent and unremitting efforts he secured an education at the Hampton Institute in Virginia. Coming to Tuskegee in the year 1881, he rented an old frame church and started a school for the colored people with only thirty pupils, working out by it some original ideas and plans.

MR. BOOKER WASHINGTON.

"Receiving contributions and assistance as he made his needs known, he bought a tract of land and commenced the erection of suitable buildings. To-day the school owns twenty-three hundred acres of land, of which eight hundred are under cultivation. All the improved methods of farming are taught here, and an experiment station in connection with the farm has been of great benefit. There are now forty-five buildings on the land, of which the larger ones are of brick. A chapel, seating twenty-two hundred people, has just been completed and dedicated, and no prettier or more convenient church can be found in the South.

"These buildings were all designed and constructed by the colored students under the direction and instruction of colored teachers. All the material that enters into their construction except glass and a little hardware, was manufactured in the shops and factories belonging to the school; for twenty-six trades and occupations are represented here, and industrial training, combined with mental work is the keynote of the institution. There are now more than one thousand pupils at work here, three fifths of whom are males; and all are required to learn some trade or occupation in addition to their mental training. Those who have no money to pay for board and tuition give their work at some of the many industries practiced on the grounds, and with the aid of night schools the improvement of their minds is not neglected.

"There are eighty-eight teachers here, many of whom are graduates of Northern universities. Mr. Washington, the Principal, although very quiet and unassuming, is to-day the foremost man of his race. As an orator he has few equals, and high honors have been heaped upon him by northern colleges. Not long ago Harvard University honored him with the degree of L. L. D. Three years ago, selected to deliver the address at the opening of the Atlanta Exposition, he was introduced by President Cleveland, and during the visit of President McKinley to the Tuskegee college last winter Mr. Washington rode in the same carriage with the President of the United States and the Governor of Alabama.

"In one of his speeches Mr. Washington spoke thus:

"'I am no politician; on the other hand I have always advised my race to give attention to acquiring property, intelligence and character, as the necessary basis of good citizenship, rather than to mere political agitation.' And again, 'the more I study the question the more I am convinced that it is not so much a question as to what the white man will do with the negro as what the negro will do with the white man's civilization.'"

GEORGE H. JORDAN, Citronelle, Ala.

Another cousin has sent me a letter on the part which Mrs. Washington plays in her husband's work, and the two letters so fit together, that I make no apologies for giving you so much reading on a single subject in the same month.

"To be the wife of the best known man of a race of ten million persons is no small responsibility, and yet that is probably the position which Mrs. Booker Washington holds to-day with regard to the negroes in this country. In all of Mr. Washington's work throughout the country, both in public speaking and at Tuskegee Institute, the great school for a thousand colored men and women in the middle of the 'Black Belt' of Alabama, Mrs. Washington, who is a native of Mississippi and educated at Fiske University, is her husband's most efficient helper. In addition to her other duties Mrs. Washington has done a great deal of the best kind of missionary work among the poor and untaught negro farmers' wives on the plantations. Such missionary work as this generally begins with a new broom and a lesson in sweeping, or in some such practical way. Schools and church services follow later. I have been to one plantation where there was no school for the children nearer than eight miles until Mrs. Washington began work there. The planter gave her an abandoned cabin for a schoolhouse, and Mrs. Washington paid one of the Tuskegee students to go there and teach. The teacher had to live in the schoolhouse, and the people soon became so grateful for what she was doing for their children that they began to send her things to eat. Of money they had too little to pay. One scholar would bring three 'sweet taters,' another some eggs, or ears of green corn, half a chicken or a piece of 'possum meat.' In time there was so much of this that a wooden box was placed behind the schoolhouse door to receive the gifts, and this box the scholars have named 'Mrs. Washington,' in grateful honor to the founder of the school.

MRS. BOOKER WASHINGTON.

MORTON FIELDING, Tuskegee, Ala.

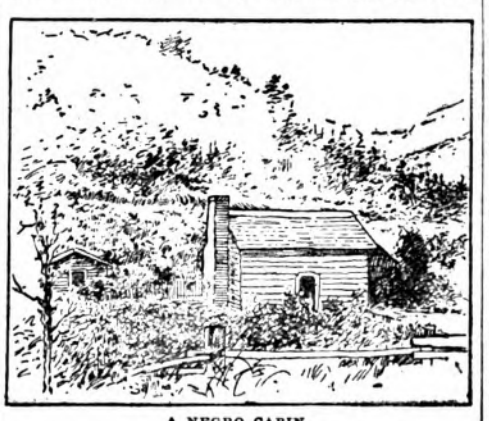
Another Kansas cousin has sent us a description of an old battle between Sioux and Comanches. He says:

"Thirteen miles up the Neosho river from the town of Burlington, on the south side of the river, is a large hill rising directly from the river's bank. This is known as Indian Hill.

"Some years ago the Comanche and Sioux Indians were here engaged in a fierce battle. It was in July, and the river had been for some time far above high water mark, and the Sioux, not being able to ford it, were at last obliged to fortify themselves upon Indian Hill. They threw up the earth in a ring several feet high, and within this ring they took shelter. The Comanches attacked them, but were driven off, leaving a number of their warriors dead upon the ground.

"The Comanches, finding they could not force the Sioux from their fortifications without considerable loss of life among themselves, determined to starve them out; so for several days and nights they kept close guard over their enemy, depending on their squaws to keep them in food. At last the Sioux, finding they must either fight or starve, determined to come out of their entrenchments and make a bold stand. A desperate conflict took place, and the Sioux were repulsed and fled in all directions. Some rode their ponies into the river, hoping to escape in that way; a few did so, but more were caught in the swift current and whirled down the river to their death. This was the Battle of Indian Hill.

"To this day the old ring-shaped ridge thrown up by the Sioux is plainly visible on the side of the hill, arrow heads are frequently picked up in the vicinity, and skulls are occasionally plowed up by the farmers."



GEORGE JOHNSON, Burlington, Kansas.

Here is a charming letter from a Georgia cousin giving us delightful glimpses of her home there.

"The most beautiful drive about the town of Rome, Georgia, is the Bluff Road. After crossing the Etowah river near where its muddy water meets the clear Oostanaula, and the two, though unmixed for a long distance, run together, forming the Coosa, the road passes, as on the outskirts of all southern towns, through a negro settlement. Half-clad pickaninnies, dogs and pigs scramble out of the road as we pass. Flowers are in the yards, clothes are constantly drying on the fences, and in the watermelon season, families are sure to be gathered on the doorsteps or perched on fences or wagons, feasting rapturously. Beyond are the fields, and in the distance, the mountains, spurs of the Blue Ridge, deep, blue, and infinitely suggestive.

"Later one reaches the pine woods with here and there a small farm. A bend in the road and it begins to ascend. Another bend, and Black's Bluff is reached. Unconsciously one slows the horse and draws a deep breath of satisfaction.

"Above are great boulders piled upon each other in a way of nature's own—trees surmount the whole and seem to reach the sky—streams trickle down and whisper of what may be seen in the wonderful heights. The winds and the wild creatures have had their own way about the plants to grow here, and that way has been a success. Everywhere, bending over the road, clambering up the heights, plants abound, vines cling to the trees and ferns fill chinks in the boulders. On the other side of the road, down a steep cliff, flows the rich colored Coosa.

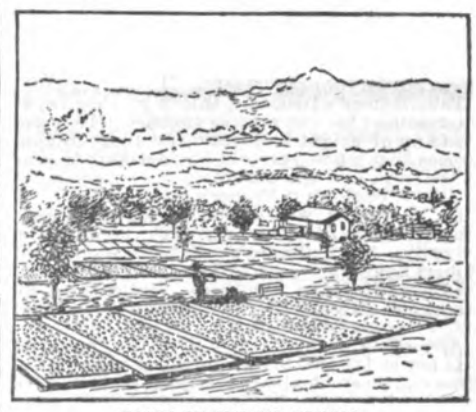
"There is a legend connected with this Bluff. Winona, Windflower, the only daughter of an Indian chief living at its foot, was loved of many, but two suitors, Gray Eagle and Black Panther, were the most urgent. Gray Eagle hoped that she loved him and Black Panther knew it.

"One day in early spring Winona set out to clamber over the Bluff in search of wild flowers. Gray Eagle joined her and there, among the great things of earth, she confessed her love for him. Black Panther, hidden behind a tree, heard her, and with deadly rage in his heart, he swore that though he could not have her, Gray Eagle should not. He drew his bow, but Winona saw her lover's danger and sprang in front of him. She fell. Black Panther looked, then flung himself from the heights upon the road below, where the crows found him. Gray Eagle gathered his loved one's body in his arms and carried it to a cave in the rocks. On a bed of flowers he laid it and covered the opening with stones and moss. He left the country to fight among foreign tribes and when wounded unto death he told this story. He did not tell where his Windflower was buried and to this day only the silent sky, the whispering trees, the grey rocks and the deep-flowing Coosa know."

FLORENCE STEVENS, Rome, Ga.

The very breath of summer comes to us in this letter from the "Lone Star" State.

"If Aunt Minerva will permit, I will tell her readers about a trip to the Artesian Well, the Mecca of most of our pilgrimages. After a drive of eighteen miles, under the burning sun, over the heated sand, we came to the cool, green wood in which the well is located. As we drove into the welcome shade we heard the pleasant sound of falling water. Several hundred feet below the surface this water starts up through an iron pipe six or seven inches in diameter. The pipe rises about four feet above the ground and the water leaps out, and falls around it, looking exactly like a large glass case. If one drops a silver coin into the well, it will be thrown back, but the more precious gold the water keeps for itself. A wedding ring, dropped from a fair finger, is lying hidden in its dark depths.



"From the basin around the pipe a 'bright clear flow of crystal wandering water' slips away to the lake. In the shadow of the giant trees lies the beautiful lake fringed with rushes, flags and cat tails, and almost covered with the broad pads and creamy blossoms of the water lilies.

"Soon after our arrival camp fires began to twinkle, and the aroma of supper rose upon the air. Never was a meal more thoroughly enjoyed than that one, though we sat on the sand, ate from tin plates, and drank black coffee from tin cups.

"We Texans are a sociable people and in a short time our party had become acquainted with a crowd of young folks from a neighboring town. We gathered at the well, and passed the time away with music and dancing. Under the flaring torches we danced on the level ground, while a mellow voice sang to the ringing banjo and the musical splash of water. In the black woods the owls chanted a wierd chorus, the frogs in the lake gave them answer, and occasionally the dismal howl of a wolf came from the dim distance. When many a dance over a polished floor, under glittering lights, to the sound of exquisite music, has been forgotten, that one will live in my memory."

SHELL F. ACREE, Whitesboro, Texas.

"In Napa Valley the prune trees blossom in March, and for a few days thereafter there is great anxiety lest an untimely frost should destroy the crop. The blossoms are often so thickly set as to hide the tree, and the fruit, as it matures, so weighs down the branches that they must be tied or bolted at the crotch to prevent them from breaking.

TRAYS OF PRUNES DRYING.

Other dangers which threaten the growing crop are the strong north wind which sometimes wrecks the orchard, and a drought which will cause the fruit to wither and drop. The picking of French prunes begins late in August or early in September. Large sheets are spread under the tree and the riper fruit shaken down on them. The average yield per tree is one hundred and twenty-five pounds.

"The curing process at the 'drier' commences with pouring the prunes into a large wire 'dipper' holding a hundred and fifty pounds, which is worked by levers and submerged in boiling lye water. This thins and perforates the skins and so hastens the drying process. The lye dipper empties into the rinsing dipper and that into the hopper which shakes the fruit down into the trays on the spreader which has a rapid sidewise motion to roll the fruit in place. The trays are then carried to the drying field and laid down in rows to dry in the hot sun. The common tray is three by four feet in size, made of eight redwood shakes, four redwood side pieces and one fir lath at each end. Ten men sometimes run through fifty tons of firm or large fruit in ten hours. After lying in the sun five or ten days the fruit is sorted by hand as to quality and dryness. The good fruit is then taken to the grading machine where it is cleaned of all dirt and the different sizes separated and put in large bins or heaps. The number of prunes to the pound constitutes the grades which run from 150—160's (the smallest salable) to 30—40's (pronounced thirty fortys). There were practically no 30—40's nor 40—50's of California prunes in 1898, the most common grades being 80—90's to 100—110's.

"After 'sweating' the fruit is taken from the bin to be sacked or boxed according to the order of the wholesaler. If sacked it may be steamed or unsteamed as per order and of any size or quality. Steaming adds a few pounds weight to each sack; it softens, cleans and brightens the fruit, also destroys all insect life or possible mould. Only large sizes are boxed, and are generally steamed. The best of the boxed fruit is 'faced' on the top and the boxes nicely lined with fine paper. To 'face' is to select the largest of the grade being boxed and flatten the fruit and lay in rows. Girls do this work, also all kinds of sorting. Boxes are of various weights from ten to fifty pounds. Sacks are all one size, averaging one hundred pounds. The prunes are now ready for the market."

EFFIE C. BRYANT, Calistoga, Cal.

A western cousin sends us the following interesting bit of American history and story. He says:

"The country which was at one time designated as the 'Great American Desert' had been opened up for settlement under the Homestead Law, and as the Americans are always on the move it was not long in filling up with settlers. This was a beautiful country. The scenery was grand beyond description, with the most gorgeous sunsets, and mirages which, though false and deceptive, were magnificent. The climate was fairly good, the air pure, and the water, though so deep in the earth that it must be brought to the surface by wind pumps, was clear as crystal and cold as that which flows from the snow capped mountains.

"The first season after this region was settled the prairies were covered with droves of wild horses and herds of antelopes. Many of these horses were lassoed, tamed, and used by the settlers, while the antelopes furnished delicious steaks for their tables.

"On account of the scarcity of timber the people made themselves dugouts for dwellings. These were made by digging down several feet into the ground and laying up sods, leaving places for doors and windows. The roofs were of lumber, on which were thrown dirt mixed with gypsum to weigh them down, and prevent them from being blown off by the winds. This dirt became in time so hard-packed as to be perfectly rain-proof. The settlers then plastered these dugouts inside with gypsum mixed with sand, and their home was completed. The shelter for their stock was made in much the same way, and a strong wire was stretched from the dwelling to the stables for their guidance in case of blizzards which were very severe and came up without warning. While the blizzard lasted it was unsafe to venture far from the house, as in the darkness and blinding sleet one might easily perish within a few feet of his home.

"The summers were long and hot, and no shade could be devised. Trees were planted, but failed to grow. Crops also failed. People plowed and planted, and the crops would come up and flourish through May and June, but were invariably blasted before the end of the summer by the hot winds of July and August.

"Little by little the settlers drifted away in search of more congenial climes, and at last only a few were left, hoping against hope that they might conquer in the end and win for themselves a home in this spot of their adoption. But even they were finally forced to acknowledge that they must find new homes. The last winter of their stay was a hard one, but the young people in the one little hamlet, called Lawton, resolved that they would celebrate their last Christmas together, and make use once more of the little hall which they had built for festive and religious gatherings. They had no money to spare for gifts, and no stores in which to find them had they had the money; so they consulted their copies of COMFORT, and from the 'Busy Bee' corner they evolved many a pretty and useful gift. Space forbids that I should describe the slippers, pincushions, tidies, neckties, and many another dainty creation that they made by the aid of their much-loved paper. And their refreshments, too, they concocted from the hints that they gleaned from 'Kitchen Chats', from the same valuable COMFORT. And now that they are separated, and settled in distant homes, letters still keep up the old friendship, and they frequently recall to each other's memory the delights of that never-to-be-forgotten Christmas."

Queen Victoria's Daily Life.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

QUEEN Victoria, on the twenty-fourth of May, 1899, if she lives until then, will be eighty years old. It is interesting to know something of how the daily life of this royal woman, who will go into history as the most remarkable sovereign of this century, has been spent.

As a child the possible future of the Princess Victoria was always kept before her by her worthy mother, the Duchess of Kent, and her education was framed with a view to preparing her for the high and responsible duties which she might be called upon to perform. Her early training was very strict, and when her old governess died, no longer ago than 1870 the Queen wrote that while she had adored her, she "was greatly in awe of her."

The Duchess, who was a born diplomat as well as one of the wisest of mothers, used to take the little princess about England a good deal, saying that she thought it well the child should see much of the country, and thinking, to herself, it may be surmised, that it was well the country should see much of her.

Our initial shows her as she appeared when she ascended the throne.

Of all the beautiful and interesting furnishings and ornaments of Burghley House, the magnificent Elizabethan palace home of the Marquis of Exeter, at Stamford, I think the thing which pleased me most was a little white bed, laid with the finest of linen and hung with the choicest of lace, linen and lace yellow now with age, in which the custodian of the rooms tells visitors with pride "'Er Majesty slept the first time she came to visit 'ere, when she was but a slip of a girl."

I imagine the "slip of a girl" must have enjoyed these outings. It seems as if it must have been dull to be so much alone as such an exalted personage must be. Sir Henry Ponsonby has told of the Queen's childhood as follows: "Miss Victoria Conroy came to see her once a week, and occasionally others played with her, but with these exceptions she was left alone with the companionship of her dolls."

Now that sixty and more years have passed it is interesting, too, to read what an eye witness wrote of the daily life of the Queen at Windsor Castle in the short time which elapsed between her coronation and her marriage.

"The Queen gets up soon after eight o'clock, breakfasts in her own room, and is employed the whole morning in transacting business. She reads all the dispatches and has every matter of interest and importance in every department laid before her.

"At two she rides with a large suite, and she likes to have it numerous. She rides for two hours along the road, and the greater part of the time at a full gallop. After riding she amuses herself the rest of the afternoon with music, singing, playing, romping with the children, if there are any at the Castle, (and she is so fond of them that she generally contrives to have some there), or in any other way she fancies.

"The hour for dinner is nominally half-past seven o'clock, soon after which time the guests assemble, but she seldom appears till near eight. The lord-in-waiting comes into the drawing-room and instructs each gentleman which lady he is to take in to dinner.

"When the guests are all assembled the Queen comes in, preceded by the gentlemen of the household, and followed by the Duchess of Kent and all her ladies. She speaks to each lady, bows to the men, and goes immediately into the dining-room. She generally takes the arm of the man of the highest rank. She remains at table the usual time, but does not suffer the men to sit long after, and they are summoned to coffee in about a quarter of an hour. In the drawing-room she never sits down until the men make their appearance. Coffee is served to them in the adjoining room, and then they go into the drawing-room, when she goes around and says a few words to each, of the most trivial nature—all, however, very civil and cordial in manner and expression.

"When this little ceremony is over the Duchess of Kent's whist table is arranged, and then the round table is marshalled. Melbourne invariably sitting on the left hand of the Queen, and remaining there without moving until the evening is at an end. At about half-past eleven she goes to bed, or when the Duchess has played her usual number of rubbers, and the band have performed all the pieces in their list for the night. This is the whole history of her day. She orders and regulates every detail herself; she knows where everybody is lodged in the Castle; settles about the riding and driving, and enters into every particular with minute attention."

Sixty years later another one of the royal household, describing a day in the Queen's life says: "The Queen usually begins her day with a cup of cocoa. Tea and coffee are likewise brought to her bedside by a maid, but her choice seldom varies. A thin German rusk is eaten with the drink. At about 11.30 A. M. Her Majesty partakes of soup, or an egg beaten up in wine.

"The morning is occupied with official matters; papers are brought for signature, and state affairs are generally discussed. The Times is read to the Queen by one of her ladies. In summer time all the business is transacted out of doors.

"Luncheon at two o'clock is always the meal of the day with the Queen. The dishes are many and elaborate. During the afternoon she drives or is occupied in divers ways until tea time, another elaborate meal, as teas go, and then again until dinner, at a quarter to nine o'clock. This meal, like luncheon is exquisitely prepared. The Queen drinks during the meal claret and water or dry champagne."

That all these elaborate menus pall on the appetite though, one may infer from a passage in the Queen's published Journal where, writing of a visit to the Dowager Duchess of Athole, at Dunkeld, not so very many years ago, she says: "Excellent breakfasts; such splendid cream and butter. The Duchess has a very good cook, a Scotchwoman, and I thought how dear Albert would have liked it all. He always said things tasted better in smaller houses."

A large part of the Queen's home life has been spent out of doors. At all of her residences she has had some lawn or garden nook where she could work in the mornings. At Windsor she had a tent pitched on the lawn of Frogmore House. At Osborne she sits in a summer house. At Balmoral she has appropriated a small cottage, built principally of lath and plaster, and used originally as a gardener's cottage. Screened from the Castle by dense shrubbery, it is quite secluded, and affords a pleasant outlook on smooth lawns and quiet woods. There are only three rooms in the cottage. In one of these the Queen frequently breakfasts. In the largest room, furnished like the rest, quite plainly, Her Majesty works, writing at a large round table. One end of this room can be easily thrown entirely open to give Her Majesty the open air feeling she delights in.

How diligent the Queen has been in the discharge of her official duties Lord Beaconsfield bore witness when he wrote: "There is not a dispatch received from abroad, or sent from this country abroad which is not submitted to the Queen. The whole of the international administration of this country depends greatly upon the sign manual of the Sovereign, and it may be said that her signature has never been placed to any document of which she did not know the purpose and of which she did not approve."

READING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IN a recent occasion a friend said he never read poetry. That Scott's "Lady of The Lake" was the only poem he could ever understand. Now the reason he felt so is because he never really tried to read another poem. He had a feeling that is common to most us. Some have a kind of dread on beginning to read any new subject.

I remember I used to have a sort of dread on commencing a new play of Shakespeare, but after reading a scene or two I became interested and could not close the book until the end was reached. Is it not because we feel that we are on the outside, and that if we could only once get into the spirit of the poem all would be easy? Some of us view with consternation the idea of reading from end to end such poems as Homer's Iliad, Dante's Divine Comedy or Shakespeare's Dramas. Now to remove that first dread of undertaking one of the so-called heavy books, is the difficulty. Let us see if we cannot approach them from another standpoint. We usually think we must begin at the beginning and read right through to the end. In point of fact, any one of the great poets can be read any where.

Take Homer's Iliad and Odyssey; they are as interesting in one part as another. They are made up of bright incidents and short stories, stories that a five-year-old boy delights to hear at bedtime, and will tease for.

No one could find Homer's stories dull.

Andrew Lang, who is one of the best translators we have of Homer, once said he liked the Odyssey, Mark Twain's "Tom Sawyer" and Robert Louis Stevenson's "Treasure Island" better than any other romances. Notice that he places the Odyssey first, Tom Sawyer second and Treasure Island third.

Absorbing as the story of Treasure Island is, it is not so fascinating as the old Greek tales. Take the story of Ulysses slaying the Suitors in the palace. The latest murder in the papers cannot begin to hold the interest as that will.

In fact it seems as if the old writers exhausted the world of its good stories. James Russell Lowell, the poet, said something like this; that somehow all the good stories got told in the dawn of human existence. All Shakespeare's plays have been traced to older stories, all except one. The critics have not yet been able to find any story that suggests the plot of the Tempest.

In the case of Homer, however, no one has yet been able to unearth any older version of his stories. They are furthermore told in the plainest and most natural way; there is nothing obscure, there are no hidden meanings.

Milton is not like Homer. Paradise Lost is not the easy, natural, graceful epic, that the Iliad and Odyssey are. Milton is too much of a student for a boy or girl.

Old Homer is touching and stirring, because he forms character and is edifying. He is the best for all ages, young and old, and for all moods. He writes of battles, and he delights in the joy of battle, and in all the movements of war, yet he delights not less, but more in peace; in prosperous cities, hearth's secure, in the tender beauty of children, in the love of wedded wives, in the frank nobility of maidens, in the beauty of earth and sky and sea, and seaward murmuring rivers; in sun and snow, frost and mist and rain; in the whispered talk of boy and girl, beneath oak and pine tree.

The stories of Sophocles' plays are simple and easy to follow. The Shirt of Nessus is one of his plays, the title is "The Maiden of Trachis," but is almost always alluded to as the Shirt of Nessus. It is a story perfectly absorbing, has always been and always will be a story to strengthen every one's character. I was much surprised to learn how puritanical (we would say) the early Greek poets were.

Another Greek that all who know is to love, is Plutarch. A millionaire recently said his favorite book was Plutarch's Lives; that he read and re-read it. Isn't that curious? Who would think a busy man, who had made his million, would care to read an ancient like Plutarch? He said it was a lesson to learn how many good and great men have been destroyed by envy; that he always learned something new every time he opened the book.

Let me tell you an incident from Plutarch. Phidias, the world's greatest sculptor, had charge of building the Parthenon. Inside was the wonderful and justly celebrated statue of Minerva. It was actually covered with massive plates of solid gold. Enormous amounts were used. Pericles, the ruler of the city, charged him to weigh and keep account of all the gold he used; that it might be valuable to him. He completed the work. His brother artists were so jealous of the admiration it caused and its tremendous success, that they brought charges against him of stealing gold in the decoration of the statue. He was tried. He produced his accounts. They had to acquit him. Then they turned around and accused him of blasphemy, because among the figures he wrought on Minerva's shield he made his own portrait. They succeeded in convicting him; he was punished by death. Envy got in its deadly work. As luck would have it a part of that shield was discovered in modern times, and on that fragment is Phidias' portrait; fate has given us his picture and has denied every other Greek artist the privilege of sending his portrait down to posterity. Such incidents make up Plutarch's Lives.

With a very little effort on your part, you would soon fairly revel in these good old books. What stories there are here for everybody! What a sea on which to sail! What golden freights to carry! No Spanish galleon was ever treasure laden as you may be if you but put forth your hand.

To read with an ever advancing progress you must have an aim. The highest aim is the literature of Greece. When you can appreciate and love the Greek poets you have reached the ultimate goal of earthly literature. This is said, not to have you think for a moment that it is for the benefit of bookworms, but it is for the every-day person like you and me, who read what happens to come before us.

Homer, Shakespeare and Dante are the supreme poets. They are the summit of human endeavor. And how then can we consider ourselves a part of humanity's fabric, if we have not made at least one of those men's masterpieces a part of ourselves! Each one of those men cost an entire civilization. Can we afford to leave this world and not know what at least one of them has to say to us? He created his work for you and me, for each and every child of earth. To ask this question is to answer it. For there are few who do not thirst for knowledge.

FARMING THE RABBIT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

RABBIT farming may yet become an important industry in this country. In Europe it is conducted on quite an extensive scale, as may be judged from the fact that no fewer than 80,000,000 of these long-eared animals are grown annually for food purposes in France alone. They afford, indeed, the cheapest kind of meat eaten by the French people. Immense numbers of them are consumed in the cities, and rabbits are kept in much the same way as poultry are in the United States, every family in the rural districts owning a few. Small farmers raise a few hundreds each year, netting perhaps $50 or so from the sale of them.

The common cotton-tail rabbits, so familiar in this country, would never do for farming purposes, inasmuch as their meat is very inferior to that of the European varieties. It has too high a flavor to obtain popularity in the markets. However, there is no reason why the best of the foreign kinds should not be introduced into the United States, and their rate of breeding is so enormous that millions might be got from a few pairs in the course of a dozen years. In France the Russian rabbit is most highly prized for its flesh, which by epicures is pronounced delicious. This variety is white, spotted with black, and with nose and ears of a peculiar russet color.

The so-called Russian rabbit is of small size, weighing about 4 pounds when dressed. There are, however, several varieties of rabbits in Russia, where, as well as in Austria, hare skins are commonly tanned and used as furs by the poorer classes. In the same way, some of the Indians in this country used to employ rabbit pelts very largely as furs. This was particularly true of the Piutes and other tribes of the Great Basin, who, having little larger game available, sewed the skins of jack-rabbits together for garments and bedding. The jack-rabbit, by the way, is itself a species of hare.

The profit obtained by rabbit farming in Europe is due chiefly to the fact that the animals can be fed on the waste of farm and garden. If it were necessary to buy all their food, it would cost $6 or $7 a month to feed 100 bunnies. In France or Germany, a farmer who begins with 100 of the long-eared stock expects to have, after the first six months, 300 to 350 rabbits to sell every three months. If he did not sell any for one year, he would have at least 1500 at the end of that time. This gives a notion of the extraordinary rate at which these little animals increase. They are most commonly kept in boxes, an allowance of two square feet for each rabbit being made, and the understanding is that the more they eat the bigger will be the profit.

In Germany several millions of wild hares are killed annually, and not only are they eaten in vast quantities by all classes, but their carcasses are exported to Paris, London and Switzerland. Hares are as definite a part of the annual product of the land as beef or potatoes, and the wholesale destruction of them cannot be said to be attended by any cruelty, inasmuch as, if not killed off closely each autumn, they would become too numerous and a dangerous nuisance. In Leipsic and many other cities and towns of Germany there are regularly organized rabbit-breeding clubs, and these associations hold exhibitions every year, to which rabbits are sent from all over the empire.

Reliance may be placed in the accuracy of the data here set forth, inasmuch as they have been gathered recently by consular agents of this government in Europe. From their statements it appears that Belgium is another country where vast numbers of rabbits are raised for food. Indeed, five distinct varieties are bred for market in Belgium, and are known respectively as the "ordinary Flemish," the "Flemish Giant," the "Russian," the "silvered" and the "Angora." The first of these is the Belgian wild rabbit domesticated; it weighs 6 to 8 pounds alive, and is greyish with spots of black or white. The Flemish giant belongs to the same race, and differs from the variety just described only in size, being the largest of all rabbits raised in Belgium. Though equally good as food, it is comparatively scarce. Its average live weight is 15 to 18 pounds, and when dressed it weighs 10 or 11 pounds. It is chiefly raised for exhibition purposes, and an exceptional specimen weighing 20 pounds will sell for $8. Just think, if you please, of a rabbit weighing 20 pounds!

The Angora rabbit is comparatively small, but has very long hair, which must be carefully combed every week in order to keep it clean. The combings sell at $1.25 to $1.75 a pound, and are especially used in the manufacture of priests' hats. These rabbits sell alive at $2 to $2.25 each; they are the rarest variety in Belgium, and are raised mainly for exhibition. Immense numbers of the ordinary Flemish rabbits are slaughtered about Eastertime, when four or five months old, their weight being 3 to 4 pounds and the price 13 cents a pound. After the skins have been removed, the carcasses are packed in wooden cases for export. The skins, stretched and dried, sell for 3 cents each to dealers, who handle them in large quantities and dispose of them to makers of hats. The Belgian giants are usually raised in dry pens, well lighted and ventilated. In France, on the other hand, the most approved method of rearing the Russian rabbits is to let them run free in large warrens surrounded by wire fences.

Rabbit pelts are utilized for imitating many of the most expensive kinds of furs, including seal, white fox, black fox, lynx, ermine and otter. From 2,000,000 to 5,000,000 of the skins are collected in Russia annually, and these are the finest of all. Their natural white color imitates the white fox, and they are easily dyed so as to counterfeit lynx and black fox. An excellent imitation of the fur of the Arctic fox, worth $50 a skin, is made by waxing the tips of the rabbit hairs, and then dyeing the pelts brown. Thus the tips are left white, and the effect is beautiful.

Million on millions of rabbit skins are imported from Australia to Europe, where the fur is utilized for making hats. They are first dried, and the coarse hairs are extracted by hand for use as bedding or upholstery. The fur is then clipped off by machine, the skins being fed between two rollers to a cylinder fitted with four razor-edged knives placed slantwise. The cylinder revolves at a high rate of speed, separating the fur from the skin and cutting the latter into thin thread-like strips. The fur, after being put through a blower, is ready for market. The blowing apparatus is 200 feet long, and through this the fur is carried by a strong current of air, thus separating the fine material from any coarse hair or other refuse that may be mixed with it. The skin strips are sold for glue stock and as material for the confectioner's product known as "jujube."

Immense quantities of rabbit skins are imported into this country annually, most of them coming from Australia, for use in making hats. There is no reason why all of them should not be grown in the United States—i. e. raised by farmers. When it is considered how extensive is the market for pelts of this kind, not only for hats but for many other purposes, it seems surprising that Americans should not already have taken up the rabbit farming business on a large scale.

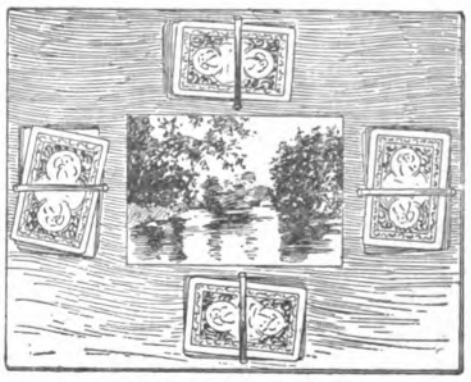
DECORATED WHIST BOARDS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

DUPLICATE whist is a standard amusement at our house. When we were first introduced to that form of the game, we were content with the boards offered for sale in the stores. But they were of white stock, which soiled quickly, and they had an abominable border of colored paper, which gave the entire outfit a cheap look.

So, to secure an attractive set of boards, which should be unlike those owned by any one else, photography was drawn upon for assistance.

The first purchase was twelve Collins mounts, 11x14 inches, bottle-green in color—the darkest obtainable—with beveled gold edges, and extra heavy.



Platinotype prints that never get mounted because the mounts cost so much may be a feature of other amateur collections; in this case there were a hundred or more on hand, all 5x7 inches in size. A careful selection of twelve prints from the lot gave a dozen pictures of general interest, and of considerable variety, landscapes and marines, some vertical and some horizontal. Of course care was taken to select such as would harmonize with the dark background. These prints were trimmed with a generous hand, on general principles, but especially since there would be none too much margin when they were mounted. For the same reason it was necessary to center them carefully, so that the opposite margins might be equal.

A steel punch was used to make four pairs of holes in each board, one pair on each side, in the center, the outside hole being as near the edge as practicable and the distance between the holes of each pair being determined by the width of the playing cards to be used upon the boards.

A handsomely printed calendar furnished a leaf from which were cut large numerals, 1 to 12, and these were pasted on the backs of the boards, in the center.

In a set of twelve boards, each player will have three leads. On the first round, the boards must face North, for instance; on the second round, for playing the "duplicate," they will face East. The boards are to face as the pictures on them face.

If the lead of board number one is with North the lead of board number two will be with East, that of board number three with South; that on board number four with West; and so on for the remaining eight boards. To indicate these leads two small gilt stars, ready gummed, such as are obtained at the stationery stores for counters at progressive card parties, were used. These were fixed at the edge of the picture on the appropriate side of the board.

DUPLICATE WHIST BOARD.

Ordinary black elastic webbing, an eighth of an inch wide, was passed through each pair of holes and was sewn together on the back, making a single durable band to hold the cards in place. This completed the work and the board was ready for the cards.

The set described seems to have many advantages over most of those offered for sale. The dark mount shows no soil from handling and the bands are infinitely better than ordinary rubber bands held together by hooks or other contrivances, which may scratch the table. No attempt is usually made to ornament the stock patterns sold in the stores.

The pictures have been very much admired. Madame H—, who comes in often to play with this particular set of boards, always looks at the pictures throughout the set before beginning to play, so that her attention may not be distracted during the game, she says.

For the photographer who delights in duplicate whist, the making of an original and beautiful set of boards is simple. Such a set, too, makes a handsome and acceptable holiday gift, with the giver's personality plainly expressed in his work. Of course the pictures need not be platinotypes. Even a dozen pretty blue prints, on cards offering a suitable background, would serve to make an attractive set. Nor must the pictures be 5x7 inches in size. Prints 4x5 would look well on the 11x14 mounts or if preferred, they could be mounted on 10x12 cards. Ordinarily cards larger than 11x14 would not be suitable, owing to the limited size of most card tables.

The matter of expense may be regulated by the maker to suit his pocketbook, in the quality of the mounts and the kind of prints used. The set described cost, for mounts, $1.20; for platinotypes (paper only) 60 cents; for elastic webbing, 15 cents. The stars were on hand, but they cost only a few cents. Some obliging neighbor always has a punch to loan, if there is none in the family. The boards cost, then, $1.95, or with twelve packs of playing cards at 20 cents, $4.35 complete. By using cheaper materials they need not have cost half that sum, but in this case, "money was no object." The set was made in an evening.

The illustration shows one of the boards described, and the picture is of a bend in the Quinebaug River, near Southbridge, Massachusetts.

HAIR TREATMENT FREE.

When your hair begins to fall, you may know that you are on the high road to baldness.

When your scalp is covered with dandruff, and is itchy and irritable, your hair will soon begin to fall.

Dandruff and hair-falling may go on for months or years but the end is always the same—baldness.

When your hair first falls, new hair may come in, finer in texture than the first. This may fall and be replaced by still finer; at last this will fall, and none come to replace it, and you may have to go through life with a shiny poll.

The moral is to keep your hair when you have it.

To take care of it while you may.

To fight dandruff perseveringly and persistently.

To kill the scalp microbe of dandruff, from which all hair trouble arises.

The way to do it, as Horace Greeley said, is to do it.

When it is too late, it is too late.

Begin now.

The old way, upon which all hair treatment was founded, was to stimulate the scalp, by strong, irritating, drawing lotions the constant use of which is dangerous and harmful to the scalp skin.

It is not the skin that is sick. It is the hair root.

The microbe is there and must be destroyed before the hair can be made well.

Cranitonic Hair Food the perfect formula of Dr. E. Fahrig, Professor of Chemistry and Doctor of Science, will do it.

It DESTROYS the microbe.

It NOURISHES the hair back to health.

It will cure dandruff, prevent baldness and restore the youthful color to the hair when prematurely gray.

Cranitonic Hair Food will do this because it is a scientific microbicide and food for the hair, and thus goes directly to the root of the trouble.

Cranitonic Hair Food is not a dye. It has no dangerous, sticky, heavy sediment to poison the scalp, clog the pores, mat the hair or stain the clothing.

It is pure and clear as crystal, perfectly harmless and will cure when everything else has failed.

To prove its efficacy we will send to all who write mentioning COMFORT a FREE BOTTLE of Cranitonic Hair Food, by mail, prepaid.

Simply send your name and full address to Cranitonic Hair Food Co., 526 West Broadway, New York, when the free bottle will be mailed to you.

The fabled race of Amazons seems to bid fair to be established in America. The American woman is growing larger—the American man smaller. The stately type of the Gibson girl is not confined to pen and ink sketches but may be found all over the length and breadth of the land. The shoe people first attracted public attention to this fact by saying that a number three shoe was rarely called for and was an exceptionally small shoe whereas in the last generation "ones" and "twos" were common sizes. "Four" is considered a very small number to-day and women generally wear fives and sixes. The fact that women walk more than they need to and in general take more exercise may explain the fact of their size. As a rule the American man leads far too sedentary a life and it shows in his physical deterioration as regards size. Women on the contrary have improved their mode of living and the result is the "divinely tall" young woman of modern times.

There is no stronger illustration of the passive fatalism of the Chinese than the absolute inertia which is the sole argument which the Oriental offers to the threatened partitions of the Chinese Empire. China as a nation does not exist if patriotism or any love of a form of government make a country. No partitions of geographical territory could effect any change in the native Chinese. They are the one nation that remains wholly indifferent to the transforming influence of a residence in the United States. No matter how marked the nationality of another foreigner is he becomes an American in a few years. Not so with John Chinaman. He neither argues, investigates, nor protests. He simply keeps on in the fashions that have marked his men for unknown hundreds of years. The Chinese Empire might be divided by force and diplomacy into geographic sections but the men of nature would remain just as they are—quiet, impassive with the strange content that makes their point of view of the "foreign devils" seem almost inimical.

One of the most interesting sides of the "Woman" question is a recent examination into her work as an inventor. The Patent office reports of 1895 show that 5000 inventions have been made by women and that among these are many of the most valuable in the list of patents. There is also a close relation between woman's opportunities in the line of higher education and her inventive ability. The first patent issued to a woman was in 1808 for straw weaving. During the next twenty-five years but fifteen patents were issued to women. As her opportunities for education were enlarged her inventive genius developed and the next quarter of a century saw thirty-five patents granted to women. It has been often asked why women did not figure more prominently as inventors. Mechanical inventions are largely in the line of machinery and women have had little opportunity to study and examine such work. One of the earliest patents issued to woman was for a deep sea telescope that has proved of invaluable service in scientific investigations. Invention is a peculiar form of genius and implies the possession of the highest form of imagination—that is the constructive imagination.

The horseless carriage or automobile is steadily winning its way in the cities. There is much to commend it from the business economic and humane point of view. The vast movement of merchandise and property in a city can be done much more quickly by this modern mechanism. The spectacle of horses struggling under heavy loads will be seen no more. Again on this humane side, horses will not be kept waiting for hours in storms or severe weather. The elimination of noise is no small part of the argument in favor of the automobile. The heavy rubber tires move along in a nearly noiseless manner. People need have no fear that the horse will become an extinct animal because he ceases to be a beast of burden. The automobile lifts the horse from a beast of burden to an entire occupancy of the sphere that he only half fills at present—that of a means of pleasure. Nothing can take away from the life of a drive behind a good horse. The automobile will in time become the vehicle of business and convenience—it can never be that of mere pleasure. After one ride the novelty is gone and one realizes that while an automobile is business a good horse is pleasure.

Decoration Day carries a tender and solemn meaning to the heart of the nation and to the hearts of many, many people who have never felt the personal sense of loss until this May day of 1899. With an added tenderness the blossoms will shower upon those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray. Their sons and daughters united in mourning the last solemn harvest of those who died for the honor of their nation, and for the never dying cause of human freedom will turn from the fresh broken sods to those that are green with the grass of thirty summers. Through the mighty convulsions of the struggle in which t' ose men gave their lives rise a real union, a new nature. In the solemn words of Lincoln—we know that those dead "have not died in vain and that government of the people by the people and for the people shall not perish from the face of the earth." The fresh made graves of these later heroes attest to the truth of these words. The dead of the Spanish war have given their lives for this immortal principle of freedom. The united nation stands with bared head and solemn grief beside its thousands of soldiers dead, but this later grief is without regret and carries with it no shade of bitterness.

The Woman Suffrage movement scores its greatest success in the West. The Anti-Suffrage League of New York and Massachusetts fail to find any very telling argument against the question in the records of Wyoming, Colorado and Idaho. The Oklahoma Legislature in its lower house recently passed a bill granting suffrage to women almost unanimously. It would seem that the men of the West were either more chivalrous or more observant of the signs of the times than their brothers in the East. Beyond this doubtless is the fact that the Western women without a dissenting voice ask for the suffrage privilege. It is unusually exercised along educational lines and lines of reform. Kansas recently elected women as County Superintendents of Schools in nineteen counties. Wyoming counts among her intelligent women the present National Superintendent of Indian Schools. Miss Reel, of Colorado, was so pleased with her woman State Superintendent of Schools that she has chosen another woman to succeed her. The women of California have just succeeded in securing full school suffrage. There is now no doubt that the western part of this country is more keenly and intelligently interested in the suffrage movement than any other part of the country.

Mr. Mortimer Delano is not a prophet or the son of a prophet but he is the winner of a newspaper prize for the most accurate predictions as to the happenings of 1898. His remarkable success he declares to be neither clairvoyance, astrology or calculation. He won his $1000 in gold by an article which he says he wrote in half an hour without preliminary study or meditation. More than that—in spite of his wonderful ability in guessing, Mr. Delano is not a Yankee. Here is the list of happenings he outlined for 1898. A year of prosperity for America, election of a Republican governor in New York, annexation of Hawaii, war between Spain and the United States, freedom for Cuba, Spain threatened by Carlist war in Spain, decision of the United States to build the Nicaraugua Canal, completeness and opening of the Siberian railroad, Secretary Sherman's retirement from the cabinet, trouble between France and England in middle Africa, first use of a motor cycle, threatened uprising of the natives in India with Russia as a background. Certainly no more remarkable forecast of events could have been made. The old proverb that it is the unexpected that happens would seem to be in a fair way to be discredited if Mr. Delano's gift becomes at all common. His profession is that of a genealogist, but after this phenomenal success in reading the future he could easily go into business as a broker in "futures." In this age of study of the occult he certainly neglected a business opportunity for financial advancement by disclaiming any powers but the chance of a lucky guesser.

The Hundred Year Club is the latest word in organization. The originators discovered that only one person in a hundred lives to the age of sixty-five years. There are exceptional persons who reach the century mark. The Club believes if right conditions of living are known the life of man may be lengthened. If a man lives "well" in the best sense of the word he can and will live long. Both men and women are members of this club and although it originated in New York City it will establish branch clubs all over the United States. The influence of the physical, mental and moral upon the length of life will be carefully studied. The purely materialistic side which considers the body merely as a perfect piece of mechanism will be examined. The food that furnishes the power for this mechanism will receive careful attention. Gladstone's saying, "all time and money spent on training the body pays a greater interest than any other investment" will be fully exemplified in the work of the club. Exercise, food, rest, all that keeps the mechanism in running order will furnish topics of discussion, and specialists along those lines will enlighten the club. Health foods and scientific cooking will be fully discussed as a means of reaching the hundred year mark. Members must all promise faithfully to endeavor to live a hundred years. It is safe to say that the people who join have answered the dreary question of the times: "Is life worth living?" in the most emphatic affirmation. People who wish to live a hundred years are people who find life good and pleasant. It would go without saying that a sunny optimistic spirit must pervade this new club. It would certainly help people to live long if their associates are convinced that the game of life is worth such a long candle. Success to the new club and in the words of Rip Van Winkle "May it live long and prosper."

The Ancient Troubadours.

How Music and Poetry were Preserved and Fostered in the Middle Ages.

The announcement of a series of lectures before New York art circles on the Troubadours has caused considerable interest and much discussion; and has called attention to the great debt modern musical culture is under to these people of whom so much is said in all accounts of life in the middle ages.

In our present days of enlightenment we can scarcely conceive the condition of even the most wealthy people in those times. Everything was in a semi-barbarous condition and outside rude athletic sports or dangerous tournaments there was but little amusement. Books there were none save such written lore as might be found in abbeys and other religious institutions. The rich feudal lords kept state in their castles and wore the long evenings out with riotous debauchery and song at the table. Each great man supported a throng of soldiers, servants and retainers, who were amused with the jokes and antics of the court jester or listened enthralled by the singing of the minstrels and troubadours.

The word troubadour comes from the French words meaning to find art. In these early days the troubadours put the deeds of great men into poetry and accompanying themselves on instruments would sing these lyrical songs for the delectation of the people in the strongholds. They were the newsgatherers of their day and repeated the tales of blood and war and love as our newspapers do to-day. It is easy to see by this how welcome such artists must have been as a break in the dull monotony of castle life.

In course of time minstrelsy became an art and many of the poems and songs were written and are preserved. Some of them are even now sung as national airs in modified form. Had it not been for the troubadours the art of music and poetry would have practically died out in the middle ages of modern civilization; but they carried it along in constantly improving lines and laid the foundations of the best in modern musical art. Readers of COMFORT will find much amusement and instruction in reading more of these artists who really did so much for us; but the lack of space in this paper prevents further details.

Before closing these few words on this class of singing poets we wish to call the reader's attention to the fact that all our modern songs are directly traceable to the environments of the times and that many songs suggested by love, war or sentiment are in a modern way products of the same art the troubadours cultivated and preserved. We publish above a beautifully sentimental piece which is winning much favorable comment.

COMFORT has always prided itself on being the "People's paper" and giving its readers the best of everything at nominal cost; but in its production of modern high-class music we feel that we have outstripped all records. It certainly is a source of deep gratification to feel that COMFORT by its modern methods is doing so much for the advancement of art and cultivation among many who would be debarred such privileges were it not for the liberal offers we make. If you have the slightest interest in music either for yourself or a friend look at our wonderful music offer on another page. Remember this is full sheet music and we guarantee return of money in any case where there is dissatisfaction. Nothing can be fairer than that. Make just one trial to-day.

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

OF first-class machines there is but little variation from those of last year; but of second-class machines the number is much less. It has been found in practice that the second-class machines built from parts that are made by various firms, lack stability and strength. Like everything else, in bicycles the best is the cheapest. So it is that we find but little change in the form or character of the wheels from that they had a year ago.

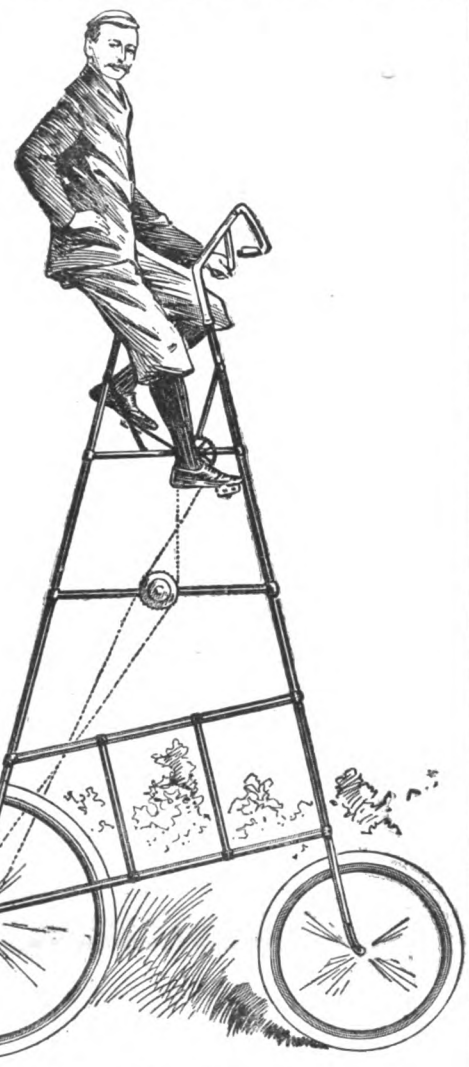
In the good old days before we rode on trains, walking was a capital exercise, but to go awheel in the early summer morning along the quiet roads and through the shady groves is a sensation of delight in which elation is the dominating factor. It has brought health to many a weakened man and made the roses to bloom on many a woman's cheek. It is superb, thrilling and magnificent; none of the adjectives can do it justice.

The wheel has come to stay. It came first as the velocipede, 40 years ago; then it developed into the high-wheeled bicycle, and from thence into the safety. A safety it is and a safety it will remain with gears and sprockets and improvements innumerable; but still a safety.

Col. Albert A. Pope, is the American to whom, perhaps, belongs the development of the wheel. He invented the big-wheeled bicycle and had valuable aid in the favor and service of Mr. Paul Butler and Mr. Willis Farrington.

The "Safety" has revolutionized the modes of travel, supplied a new source of pleasure and added a permanent industry to the business interests of the world. The improvements have been very great and have been suggested by mechanical skill of the finest description. Nothing has been spared to make the machine perfect, and in the bicycles of this year that stage has almost been reached. The superiority of the chainless wheel has been proven after long and exacting tests, and it is to have the favor which excellence and cheapness commands. Last year, a chainless machine cost $125; this year the chainless costs $75.

Bicycles are numerous and there does not seem to be a very great difference in their variety. The patterns are almost identical and whatever bought are bound to give satisfaction. Only one thing to remember, that if you want a good wheel you must pay for it.



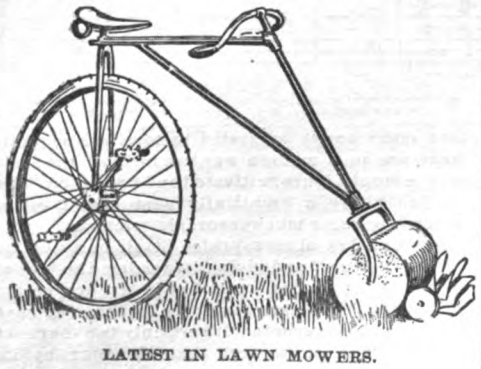
The "jointed crank" is one of the new things in bicycle parts. This is formed by using the ordinary crank and pedal in connection with an intermediate fitting, 1 1-4 inches in length and weighing four ounces, which connects the crank-end and pedal-pin, so that the pedal swings just below its accustomed place, after the fashion of a swinging pedal. The result is that the rider is enabled to use a frame two inches lower than usual, or a saddle adjustment lower to that extent, and to overcome both dead center and chain back lash.

In addition, the leverage is so varied that it reaches its highest power at the forward thrust and its minimum on the upward stroke, where little power is needed. Among the additional advantages claimed are ease in hill-climbing, decreased vibration of the pedal, increased power in back-pedalling and lessened chance of serious accident should the pedal strike an obstruction.

With regard to the new bikes for the summer, the frames show a uniformity in design and height much like those in vogue last year. Short heads predominate, and as a general thing there is possibly a slight decrease in the drop of the crank-hanger. There is a disposition to run to higher gears and longer cranks, and wider and higher handle-bars seem to be in the most conspicuous.

In the bevel-geared chainless wheels a new adjustment is shown which ought to appeal to the average rider. Under the old arrangement when the rider wished or thought that he wanted his gears adjusted he was forced to take his wheel to an expert dealer. With the new arrangement he can adjust the cogs with about the same ease that a man can adjust the chain on the regular wheel. The adjustment is made with a nut on the outside of the shaft, and it can be made without the cups being removed. There is a sort of tongue groove arrangement on the inside of the shoulder.

The new Columbia chainless machines for 1899 show various improvements as a result of a season's observation and study. The frame lines have been brought up to date and the larger tubing, internal expanders, smaller gear covers, narrow rear forks and hubs, general refinement of detail, in combination with the construction necessary to the chainless gear, impart to these new models attractiveness and style. Certain important changes have been made in the running gear. The forward mechanism, which last year was assembled directly into the crank bracket itself, is now placed in an independent bushing or sleeve, which is inserted in the bracket and clamped in position. The gear adjustments, both front and rear, have been made independent of each other, thus greatly simplifying the operation of bringing the gears to mesh. The ball race of each gear bearing forms a part of the gear itself bringing the bearing directly into the line of thrust, and doing away with all danger of springing the gears in hard pedalling.



THE EIFFEL TOWER BICYCLE.

The company has devoted especial attention to the production of tandems of the double diamond and combination types, and believes that the present models are the strongest, safest and easiest running tandems ever manufactured. They are offered as embodying everything essential to the comfort, convenience and perfect enjoyment of the many who gain exhilaration and pleasure in riding machines of this class.

One of the New York talking machine companies is sending out on its cylinders a humorous tale of a one-legged farmer, who attached a bicycle to a mowing machine and won a prize at cutting hay. This fiction has now developed into a fact, for in one of the small towns on the Hudson River is a man who has actually made the combination. By dismantling his bicycle and attaching it to the lawn mower he is able to cut grass on level ground with very little difficulty. It is announced that he expects to be able to so improve the machine that it will operate safely upon hillsides.

In Chicago, there is already the "Eiffel Tower bike;" the frame is between 9 and 10 feet high and braced strong enough so that the rider can sit on it safely and see everything on the road. He climbs up the ladder-like frame and wheels off as though he were monarch of all he surveys. The affair will scarcely become popular, however.

THE PRESIDENT'S HAT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

PRESIDENT McKinley recently visited New England. A vast crowd of humanity packed closely into Dewey Square, Boston. Drawn up beside the station was a handsome landau with four spirited horses attached. A sudden swaying of the crowd, cheer after cheer upon the air and the President of the United States was escorted to the carriage. The dignified coachman on the box was the one silent and motionless human being in all that vast assemblage. The familiar lifting of the hat, the bared head, the debonnair bow as the carriage made its way through the crowd. The dinner given by the Home Market Association, the largest dinner ever given under cover in this country; the State House hastily visited; the Commercial Club breakfast; a hurried drive to the station; the shouting crowd; a receding figure, hat in hand, on the platform of a car, and the President's visit to Boston was over.

Before the wheel of fortune brought us so many times into close proximity to the Executive of this nation, it had been our impression that a man's hat belonged on his head. This may be the general rule. To it, there is one exception at least. The hat of a President evidently belongs in his hand. The poet in embryo who wrote,

"I would I were the President
Of these United States,
All day I would do nothing
But swing on all the gates," should have added, with my hat on, if he had wished to convey a perfect expression of blissful freedom from all responsibilities.

The day of the inauguration of William McKinley, President Cleveland and the President-elect rode together to the Capitol, as is the custom. During the ride both gentlemen were called upon, from time to time, to acknowledge the greetings of the people. On their return, however, after the oath of office had been administered, the hat of Mr. Cleveland was placed squarely on his head, with a firm, immovable, put-there-to-stay expression, that seemed to indicate the wearer's satisfaction in relegating one of the penalties of greatness, at least, to the bowing gentleman by whose side he rode.

Mr. McKinley's hat failed to fulfill its mission as a head covering, several months before that fourth of March, 1897. From the time the button touched at St. Louis set the cannon booming and the bells ringing in Canton, Ohio, to announce the nomination of its townsman, to that election night in November on which the inhabitants knew neither sleep nor rest—when the screaming of steam whistles and the tooting of horns, made Fourth of July a thing of beauty by comparison—the hat of Major McKinley seldom found a resting place on the crown of his head.

There was an interest, a unique charm, an excitement about Canton during those months that can be realized only by those whose walks in life led them up and down its broad and brick-paved avenues.

On the day of nomination, as soon as the mouth of the cannon announced the welcome news, the waiting crowd like a mighty torrent surged through the streets of Canton. The townspeople poured into the market-place from east, west and south. Hemmed in by the buildings on either side, together they rushed along to the McKinley homestead. The first speech of the nominee had scarcely ended when a delegation rolled into the station from Alliance, twenty miles away. The members had been seated in a special train waiting for the word that sent them spinning down the track, almost beating Canton itself by their prompt appearance.

From that day the town gave up work as a means of livelihood and plunged headlong into the dissipations of a "home campaign." Badges and decorations appeared as by magic, and every breast that throbbed for Mr. McKinley was freely frescoed with knobs and buttons. Among womankind baking on Saturdays became as one of the lost arts. That day was the favorite one for arrivals, and the town put on an extra air of gaiety. Train after train, decorated with flags and streamers, bearing on top as well as inside the cars their loads of living freight, drew into the station. There were processions of all kinds, and bands of all tones. There were companies of six-footers and companies of first voters. There were groups of women headed by brass bands played by members of their own sex. Often, several delegations marching behind music paraded the streets, keeping out of the way until a more fortunate delegation already at the house of the nominee, was received and despatched. Of what use was the hat of Mr. McKinley in those days?

Canton is in Stark County. In 1892 the State Treasurer of Pennsylvania was elected by the largest Republican vote ever polled there for that office. A coon captured in Stark County was sent as a present to the Treasurer, with the request that it be returned in 1896, on the nomination of Major McKinley for President.

One day a special car came in, bearing a perfect model of the White House. Snugly ensconced within the walls rode its tenant, the Republican coon, formerly of Stark County. The house was made in Apollo, Pennsylvania, of McKinley American tin, and the front door bore in bas relief, the face of William McKinley. Another day, representatives of the plumbers in Pittsburgh came marching up the street, bearing on their shoulders a bath-tub of porcelain and gold, whereupon the Democratic paper quietly remarked that Mr. Bryan had a bathtub in his home and didn't need one as a present.

Intense excitement prevailed among the children as well. The little six years old daughter of a Democratic neighbor announced to her astonished family that she proposed to marry the little son in our own home. "But first," said she, "I must find out if he is for Bryan." Support of Mr. Bryan being one of the necessary conditions, the marriage was indefinitely postponed.

After the November elections, the delegations disappeared. The grounds about the McKinley homestead were left as barren as a base ball field. Other lawns gave hints of past verdure and of future life, but the heath of McKinley was trodden to dust beneath the heel of the patriotic American. Another wooden fence replaced the one literally torn down and lugged away by relic hunters. Then the wheels of that machinery which was to force the country through four more years of its history, began to be oiled. Men of brain, men of influence, men of power now stepped from the trains as they rolled daily into the little Canton station. A close confidential talk between the visitor and the President-elect would at once take place, often followed by a stroll up the street and a call on Mr. McKinley's mother.

Madam McKinley in her quiet home, welcomed and enjoyed the society of all who cared to see her. Nowhere in Canton was there a more hospitable house for an afternoon chat.

"I hear that William was your favorite son," said a visitor, on one occasion.

"No, he was not," returned the old lady, stoutly, "I had no favorite son. One child was the same as another to me, and William was just like the other boys, no better, no worse."

"Give my love to your son," said she, a little later. "Tell him that he will grow up to be a good man, and be a power."

"My son will be much pleased to receive that message from you," the visitor responded.

"Well," said Madam McKinley, with decision, "I think the boys should have some notice taken of them. They like to feel that they are appreciated, that there is a place for them in the world, and something to do. I am sorry that you haven't a daughter too," she added, gently, "for there is a place in the mother's heart and life that only a daughter can fill." No momentary forgetfulness of daughter here—a forgetfulness that might be forgiven, in view of motherly pride in a son called to be the head of a nation.

Passing up the street in the gathering dusk, we often saw the President's mother sitting quietly and alone, by the window. Now and again she would lift her eyes from her knitting to peer at the passers by through her gold-bowed spectacles. Farther down the street, great men came and went, and the months rolled on.

"Do not let them spoil you in Washington, Madam McKinley," said we on the afternoon of our farewell call.

"Oh, they can't do that," was the smiling answer. "I am only a plain woman."

"Well, then, good bye, and may you have a pleasant visit."

"I am sure she will have a pleasant visit," put in her daughter Helen, quickly. "Mother usually carries her happiness with her, wherever she goes."

Don't join a "Don't Worry" club. Don't try not to worry. A little worry is a good thing for the human race. How are we ever going to progress, to grow, if we are perfectly satisfied with our present state, and never try to better it? The world was never intended to stand still.

UNCLE SAM'S NEW MARKETS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AMERICANS generally have an acute interest just now in the demands of the markets secured through the absorption of the islands and archipelagoes which have newly become part and parcel of Uncle Sam's domain.

The question is how to furnish what the inhabitants of these island-groups require—to give them what they want, at prices that will be satisfactory to seller and buyer. To begin with, it is necessary to find out what the people of the freshly-acquired realms are anxious to purchase, and this is no easy matter from the Yankee point of view.

Just for example, the case of sandals. From the every-day American standpoint, sandals are footwear belonging to the ancients, but absurd when considered in connection with modern civilization. Call them absurd if you like; but the fact is that sandals are worn generally to-day by the common people in Cuba, in Porto Rico, and in the Philippines. In fact, and this is where the point of the argument comes in—they are very nearly the most important article of importation into the West Indies now.

You take a length of small rope, and, beginning in the middle, you wind it around and around upon itself until it reaches the bigness of a shoe-sole. To this, when it is properly constructed, you add a cloth "upper," and you have a very substantial shoe. This it is that in Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippines is called a sandal. For wear in a hot climate it is vastly more suitable than the every-day leather shoe. Thus, it is not surprising to learn that the Cubans have been accustomed hitherto to buy from Spain more than $2,500,000 worth of sandals every year.

When the American manufacturer realizes this opportunity, he will begin to make sandals, and will produce them at a cheaper rate than has hitherto been known. That is what Yankee enterprise means. It is worth while incidentally, to call attention to the fact that hitherto Cuba has been accustomed to import from Spain about $3,200,000 worth of ordinary leather shoes. Of course, the only reason why they were got from Spain was that the government of the Iberian Peninsula chose to put prohibitory duties on shoes from other countries. From now on, the Cubans will be shod by American shoemakers. Within the last few months a great change has taken place in Cuba, from the view-point of the American manufacturer. The latter finds no longer any opposition to the introduction of his products in the island, and he is at liberty to send thither whatever he wants to send, with the certainty that if the stuff is good it is bound to sell. At present Cuba manufactures practically nothing, so that there is a clear field in that quarter.

When the Spaniards were in control, they exercised such a discrimination against the products of the United States, by imposing exorbitant duties on merchandise imported from this country, as to shut out our manufactures to a great extent. This was particularly outrageous in view of the fact the bulk of Cuban products was bought in the United States. It was as if you were to cut your best friend on the street—to make a practice of cutting him, that is to say, although he continued persistently to give you money to help you along. Happily, thanks to the recent war, this situation has been done away with, and now American manufacturers find the Cuban market open to them for the first time.

This is why it is worth while to know exactly what the Cubans want to buy. The figures of their imports from Spain in recent years show that they require more than $20,000,000 worth of wheat flour every year. Of cigarette paper they require about $2,000,000 worth. They call for $2,000,000 worth of beans, and for $600,000 worth of other dried vegetables. Of onions, garlic and potatoes, they demand $1,200,000 worth from outside. Wine to the extent of $8,000,000 worth finds a market on the island. They are ready to purchase $1,500,000 worth of corn, an equal quantity of rice, and $600,000 worth of butter. They are prepared to absorb annually $3,700,000 worth of manufactures of flax and hemp, $1,100,000 of woolen blankets, $3,200,000 worth of soap, $371,000 worth of silk, $337,500 worth of cotton thread, $588,000 worth of oils and paints, $255,000 worth of salt, $334,000 worth of glass bottles, $145,000 worth of mineral waters, $177,000 worth of chemicals and medicines, $172,000 worth of playing cards, and $64,000 worth of perfumery.

Now, it must be realized that these figures relate merely to exports from Spain as recorded in recent years. They are given in such detail simply for the reason that the bulk of the imports of the island have been derived from that country hitherto. But, on inspection of the imports of the United States, it is found that we have furnished to the Cubans a supply of breadstuffs which in 1893 ran up to $3,512,000 worth. Since that time, owing to the civil disturbance, the trade in this line went down to about one-third. Of bacon, in maximum years, we have sent to Cuba 10,000,000 pounds.

Naturally, we shall take from Spain the privilege of supplying Porto Rico with what that island needs. Up to the present time, it has been accustomed to receive from Spain annually $250,000 worth of soaps, $2,500,000 worth of cottons, $1,100,000 worth of shoes, $550,000 worth of rice, $550,000 worth of petroleum, $175,000 worth of felt hats, $19,000 worth of umbrellas, and $750,000 worth of sandals. These are the same kind of sandals that are in use in Cuba, with rope soles and cloth uppers. It is decidedly interesting to notice how certain people stick to certain things in the way of articles to eat and articles to be worn. Every year Porto Rico imports more than $100,000 worth of soup pastes (vermicelli, etc.) and Cuba absorbs $300,000 worth of them annually. Porto Rico has been accustomed to take from the United States from $600,000 to $950,000 worth of breadstuffs every year; of bacon and hams 1,500,000 pounds, of pickled pork 3,400,000 pounds and of lard 4,500,000 pounds.

The great requirement of the Philippines seems to be for cotton fabrics, of which they have been accustomed to import not far from $6,000,000 worth annually. Their next most important import is of paper, which is about $300,000 per annum. Then come preserved foods, representing a value of $200,000, leather $200,000, iron and steel $175,000, sandals $100,000, these are called "alparatas" in the archipelago, and umbrellas to the number of 650,000. Hats, buttons and pastes for soups are also in great demand.

For many years past the Hawaiian Islands have derived three-fourths of their imports from the United States, and about one-eighth of them from Great Britain. They want great quantities of clothing and haberdashery; likewise crockery, drugs, dry goods, blankets and fancy goods. From this country they have been accustomed to receive annually about $75,000 worth of beer, $36,000 worth of horses, $26,000 worth of hogs, $67,000 worth of mules; 125,000 pounds of shrimps, 180,000 pounds of assorted fish, 60,000 pounds of cornmeal, 27,000 pounds of oatmeal, 3,200,000 pounds of barley, 12,000,000 pounds of bran, 25,000 pounds of garlic, 220,000 pounds of hams, 370,000 pounds of lard, 230,000 pounds of laundry soap, 96,000 pounds of wire—not to mention great quantities of fresh fruits, wheat flour, furniture, wall paper, groceries, starch, sugar, agricultural tools, twine, leather, lumber and machinery.

A Maine genius announces that he has discovered the lost art of making the famous old Damascus steel, and that he has also found out how to harden copper and brass. He has been experimenting with metals in the village blacksmith shops for ten years, and has made several broadswords of copper, keen and strong as steel. He has made several knife blades and razors of copper; and has, himself, used a copper razor for months which shows no signs of dullness. A number of capitalists from Boston have made him flattering offers for his secret, which is, he says, the simplest thing in the world, and which every section worker, and every copper and brass worker tread upon every day while working at their trade and fail to see it.

Uncle Sam's Smokeless Powder.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

DURING the recent war with Spain, Uncle Sam suffered greatly from lack of smokeless powder, with which the Spaniards were provided both on land and sea. It is not the intention of this government to be caught again at a similar disadvantage, and the utmost efforts have been made recently to provide this sort of ammunition for American ships and American troops. Large quantities of it have been purchased from private manufacturers by the War Department, and a considerable stock of it has been shipped to the Philippines, where plenty of it will be kept on hand in future. At the same time, at the urgent request of the Navy Department, Congress has furnished money for establishing a plant for making smokeless powder at Indian Head, on the Potomac near Washington.

All the powder now supplied for use on our naval vessels is of the smokeless kind; likewise all of that which is distributed to our soldiers at home and abroad, whether regulars or volunteers. It is not the wish of the government to compete with private firms in the production of this species of war material, and the annual output of the factory at Indian Head will not exceed 300,000 pounds—hardly more than would be needed to stock the magazines of a single battleship once. The purpose of the plant on the Potomac will be to set and maintain a standard of excellence in smokeless powder. Hitherto Uncle Sam has been obliged to purchase whatever in this line happened to be in the market, but in future none of the stuff will be bought that does not satisfy exacting tests.

Smokeless powder originated in France, and for a long time was regarded as a mystery, the processes of its manufacture being kept secret. Now, however, the method of its production has been reduced to a scientific basis, and in this direction during the last few years the Navy Department has carried exact chemical research to the extreme limit of practical refinement. It now has a powder known to experts as "pyro-cellulose," which is equal to, if not better than any smokeless powder used by foreign nations. It has been brought down to the simplest possible chemical combination, so that apparently there is nothing beyond. In short, it may be regarded as the standard of the world.

When ordinary black gunpowder is ignited, a puff of smoke follows its burning. This signifies imperfect combustion, and in war on sea or land it is a serious disadvantage, interfering with accuracy of aim. In the naval fight off Santiago the American ships were seriously embarrassed on this account, clouds of smoke made by their own guns interrupting their view of the enemy. Our troops besieging the Cuban city suffered from the same cause, being unable to locate the Spaniards who were firing at them, while their foemen could see by the puffs of smoke just where to shoot. It was justly felt to be a serious reflection upon our government that in such an important matter as this it should be behind old-fashioned Spain.

You take a bit of smokeless powder, set fire to it, and it is instantly transformed into nothingness, so to speak, being converted wholly into gases and leaving not a trace of ash or residue. Here we have an illustration of absolutely perfect combustion, and with this matter of complete burning the shape of the powder-grains has something to do. Accordingly, smokeless powders are made in various forms, some of which are decidedly curious. For instance, a famous French kind looks for all the world like yellowish brown paper. Anybody might mistake it for ordinary wrapping-paper, but if you take a scrap of it and touch it with a match, it flares up brilliantly and vanishes in an instant.

The smokeless powder now furnished by the Navy Department for use in small arms is somewhat similar to this, being manufactured in the shape of thin brownish papery sheets. It is not served out to the ships in this form, however, but is chopped up into little bits of square pieces and packed thus into cartridges for the rifles and machine guns. For the big guns exactly the same kind of powder is used, but it is turned out in long rods of various diameters suitable to different calibers These rods are perforated from end to end with a number of holes or canals, so as to allow the igniting fire to "set off" the stuff more quickly. Before being delivered for service, the rods are cut into short lengths, so that they appear in the form of cylinders.

The Navy smokeless powder is pure guncotton, treated with a mixture of ether and alcohol. On the other hand, the smokeless powder now used by the Army is 80 per cent. guncotton and 20 per cent. nitroglycerine. As supplied for field and coast-defence guns, this latter kind of powder has the same form as that favored by the Navy—i. e., cylinders "multiperforated," but for small arms it is made in long strings like packthread and chopped up into little bits of cylindrical pieces. Up to date, the War Department has made no attempt to manufacture smokeless powder in a large way, though it has conducted experiments in this line at the Frankford Arsenal, in Philadelphia, where samples of all powders purchased for the Army are tested.

The Germans make their smokeless powders in rolls like maps. The rolls are sliced crosswise into long sticks, which are packed in bundles like toothpicks for machine guns, while for small arms the sticks are chopped into little cubes. One kind of French powder of the smokeless variety is so much like old-fashioned molasses candy that one is tempted to eat it. Again, the English smokeless powder known as "cordite" resembles thick strings of black rubber, which shape it assumes through having been forced through a colander in a semi-liquid state. Cordite is the most famous of all powders of this description, being extensively used in nearly every navy in the world. It is one of the safest explosives known, and is not dangerous unless confined. It can be held in the hand and lighted without danger, burning slowly and with a bright flame.

The basis of all smokeless powders is guncotton dissolved in nitric acid, the latter element being afterward entirely removed. Quite simple is the process by which the common and harmless substance called cotton is converted into such a terrible explosive. Pure raw cotton is steeped in a solution of nitric and sulphuric acids, the former rendering the cotton explosive, while the latter helps the nitric acid to combine with the cellulose of which cotton consists. After soaking for hours, the cotton is squeezed under rollers and washed thoroughly to remove the free acid, which, if any of it remained, would tend to decompose the guncotton. Finally, the latter appears in the shape of a soft white pulp resembling paper pulp in appearance.

This is the stuff which the experts employed by the Navy Department transform into smokeless powder by treating it with ether and alcohol. The powder used by the War Department, as already stated, combines with it 20 per cent. of nitroglycerine. This substance called nitroglycerine is an oily, colorless liquid, produced by mixing a quantity of sulphuric acid with double the amount of nitric acid and allowing it to cool. To this mixture about one-eighth of its weight in glycerine is then added gradually; the acids are drawn off, and the residue (nitroglycerine) is washed and filtered. Nitroglycerine cannot be ignited easily by a flame, and a lighted match or taper plunged into it would be extinguished. It is set off by friction or by being struck, and its explosive force is about twelve times that of gunpowder.

Smokeless powder burns slowly—slowly, that is to say, for gunpowder—and on that account the guns built in future for our Navy will be longer than those now in service. This is necessary in order that the powder shall be wholly transformed into gas before the projectile has time to get out of the muzzle. Smokeless powder weighs much less per charge than the ordinary kind, and this means a considerable saving of weight of ammunition to be carried by each ship. During the conflict with Spain the American vessel that particularly distinguished itself by its markmanship was the cruiser New Orleans, built in England for the government of Brazil and purchased by us just before hostilities were declared, together with her outfit of ammunition. Thanks to her provision of smokeless powder, the New Orleans, though not an armored vessel, was as efficient as any of our battleships.

WHILE there are some people who have a vague idea that coins issued 100 or 1000 years ago are worth fabulous sums, yet very few know that coins issued only a few years ago are at a large premium. For instance, the silver dollars of 1865 and many of the earlier ones. The first Columbian half-dollar, issued 1892, sold for $1,000. All the half-dollars from 1879 to 1890 are at a premium, also Isabella quarters of 1893, the old issue of the quarters and half-dollars of 1853, twenty-cent pieces 1876 to 1878; five and three-cent pieces of 1877; last issue of the two-cent copper and three-cent silver pieces; first issue of the nickel cents, all gold dollars and three-dollar gold pieces; all Territorial and California coins from 1849 to 1880, and thousands of earlier American and Foreign coins, Canadian especially. There is also a premium on some coins with MINT MARKS O, S, C, D or CC; also on fractional currency, colonial, continental and Confederate bills and old POSTAGE STAMPS. THE GLOBE reports that a coin was found in Galveston worth $5,000. THE NEW YORK JOURNAL says that a cent was plowed up at Aurora, N. Y., worth $1,200, and that Mr. Castle paid $4,400 FOR A STAMP found at Louisville, Ky. THE WORLD says: "Many people have become wealthy by looking after old coins and stamps." THE HOME JOURNAL says: "Coin and stamp collecting is a profitable business, as there are but few in it. The Numismatic Bank buys from Agents all over the country, and pays them big sums." Coins that are very hard to find in one section are often easily found in others. A Boston baker sold 116 coppers for $6,915, 29 silver coins for $4,713, and 4 gold coins for $1,700, and others have done nearly as well. MR. F. W. AYER sold recently a lot of stamps, collected since 1892, to Stanley Gibbons for $250,000. THE COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL NEWS says: "The Numismatic Bank is not only the largest institution of its kind, but as reliable, safe and trustworthy to deal with as any National Bank. The enormous business done by them is the result of SQUARE DEALING and liberality." Send two stamps for our illustrated circular on rare coins and stamps, which may prove to be your stepping stone to wealth and independence. NUMISMATIC BANK, (Dept. C, Boston, Mass.

The Latest Advances Made in the World's Small Arms.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

UPON a careful comparison of the Mauser gun with the Krag-Jorgensen it is found that there is little difference in point of function performed, and the structure differs but little except in matters of detail.

There are two general classes of magazine guns in use by the armies of the world: First—Those which may be used as single loaders while the magazine is charged. These arms may be properly termed "repeating" guns. Second—Those in which the magazine may be charged and then held in reserve while single fire is delivered, and the magazine fire being available at any moment.

Guns of the first class can be used as single loaders only when the magazine is empty; while those of the second class may be used as single loaders either when the magazine is filled or empty.

With the second class a cut-off is sometimes employed which prevents the loads in the magazine from being utilized when the gun is used as a single loader.

The small arms of Austria-Hungary, Germany, and Roumania are typical of the first class. England, Spain, Denmark and Switzerland use guns of the second class.

It will be obvious that a firearm which may either be used as a single loader or as a magazine gun has many advantages over a weapon which can only be used as a magazine gun or as a single loader when the magazine is empty. To illustrate one of the advantages of the guns of the second class: When soldiers are drawn up in line of battle, a column may fire and fall back, and a single loading gun is therefore just as desirable for the purpose as a magazine. But it is when a rush upon the enemy is ordered that the available five loads are of great service. On the other hand, to resist an onslaught of the enemy the reserve magazine is very useful. Soldiers in battle are inclined to become mere automatons. They load and fire ofttimes more by force of prearrangement than by operation of the mind at the time of firing. This is particularly true of the volunteer service. Moreover, extraordinary mechanical knowledge is not required of the ordinary soldier. Hence, to be a desirable firearm, simplicity of structure must be deemed a feature of much importance. Nearly all rapid fire guns in military use today have the sliding-bolt system of breech closure, and this is justly in great favor, because the movement is simple and the result certain. During the late civil war a dead soldier was found having a musket loaded with twelve charges, one on the other. Evidently he had first used a cartridge with a defective cap, and since the din of battle was sufficient to drown the noise of an explosion he thought the charge had been fired, and he then reloaded—repeating the act twelve times, and always striking the defective cap. With the sliding bolt guns such an occurrence would be impossible, as a defective cartridge would be ejected and a good one would be substituted.

A board of officers of the U. S. army, constituted for the purpose of selecting magazine arms for use in the service, made a report based upon experiments and tests of some fifty-two guns of the most approved types from all parts of the world.

Following are the tests made and results attained with the Mauser gun.

Safety test—The gun was operated by the recorder of the board and fired from the shoulder ten shots in 25 seconds.

Regular tests. I. Rapidity with accuracy. (a) As single loader and then as repeating arm for contents of magazine. The gun having no cut-off this test could not be applied exactly as contemplated; it being possible however to fire the upper cartridge in the magazine, then replace it by another, and so on, thus maintaining a single loader fire with 4 cartridges held in reserve, the test was conducted in that manner. The 16 shots were fired in 63 seconds; the 4 from the magazine in 6 seconds—total 69 seconds; 20 hits. (b) As single loader for 2 minutes, 31 shots were fired with 30 hits. (c) A magazine for two minutes. 36 shots were fired and 4 cartridges left in magazine; 35 hits.

II. Rapidity at will. (a) As a single loader and then as a repeating arm for contents of magazine. Sixteen shots in 46 seconds, the four from the magazine in 5 seconds; total 51 seconds. (b) As a single loader for one minute—18 shots were fired. (c) As a magazine arm for one minute. After third shot the locking catch was inadvertently turned, probably by operator's sleeve or arm, and the bolt locked. Resuming the test the cartridge clip of the first charge of the magazine was carried forward with the bolt jamming its action.

KRAG-JORGENSEN.

III. Endurance. (a) As magazine arm for 500 rounds. Seventeen failures to extract, the extractor tearing through head, leaving shell in chamber, and one failure where the head resisted, and shell only extracted by blows of a hammer on the head of the bolt. Two misfires, each exploded on second trial. This test was conducted in series of 50 shots, after each of which gun was cooled by passing a stream of water through the barrel. All failures to extract occurred in the latter portion of the sets of 50 shots, after the piece had become heated.

IV. Dust. (a) Magazine empty when exposed. Well dusted; bolt opened with difficulty. When endeavoring to close the bolt a number of efforts were required before it could be entirely pushed forward; then the bolt could not be rotated, the cuts for the lugs on bolt being clogged with dust that could not be removed by the hand. (b) Magazine loaded when exposed. Well dusted; bolt worked more stiffly, but yet without much difficulty.

V. Defective cartridges. By the first defective shell that portion of the extractor which, when the bolt is locked, lies under the groove for the right-hand locking lug, and is therefore not supported, was so bent upwards that the bolt could not be turned until extractor had been forced by hammer and punch.

The tests made and results attained with the Krag-Jorgensen gun are given below:

Safety Test. The gun was operated by Mr. E. Jorgensen and fired from the shoulder, 10 shots in 32 seconds. Regular tests. (a) As single loader and then as repeating arm for contents of magazine. The capacity of the magazine being 5 cartridges; 15 shots were fired a single loader in 44 seconds, the 5 from the magazine in 10 seconds; total, 54 seconds; 16 hits. (b) As a single loader for 2 minutes. 38 shots were fired and 1 cartridge introduced into chamber; 35 hits. (c) As magazine arm for two minutes. 43 shots were fired and 1 cartridge left in chamber, with 38 hits.

Rapidity at will. (a) As single loader and then as repeating arm for contents of magazine. The 15 shots as single loader in 32 seconds, the 5 from magazine in 7 seconds, total 39 seconds. (a) As single loader for 1 minute. 29 shots were fired, of which one missed fire. (c) As magazine arm for one minute—thirty-five shots were fired, and one cartridge from the eighth packet introduced into the magazine.

Endurance. (a) As magazine arm for 500 rounds. Breech and magazine mechanism worked well and easily. (b) As single loader for 100 rounds. Mechanism worked easily in all particulars.

Dust. (a) Magazine empty when exposed. Thoroughly dusted. Mechanism worked easily. (b) Magazine loaded when exposed, thoroughly dusted. First cartridge from magazine not fed into receiver until point of bullet freed by hand; mechanism then worked well.

Defective cartridges. No injury whatever from the three forms of defectives. Gun worked well.

Excessive charges. Bolt opened easily; mechanism worked well and freely.

Ease of manipulation. Satisfactory.

MAUSER GUN.

As a result of these tests the Board arrived at the conclusion that the Krag-Jorgensen gun was best suited to the needs of our army and made an unanimous report to the Secretary of War to that effect.

The reason for this conclusion will be obvious to the reader. The so-called "cut off" forming a part of the Krag-Jorgensen gun was deemed an important feature, rendering the piece a readily convertible and interchangeable single-fire and magazine arm. An officer could glance along a line of soldiers and tell by their motions whether they were using the magazine or not.

It was doubtless owing to the lack of this additional feature which led to the adoption of the Krag-Jorgensen gun as against the Mauser.

Both guns have the sliding bolt for ejecting the empty shell by the backward pull, and pushing a cartridge into the receiver by the reverse action.

Smokeless powder cartridges were used in the Mauser and common black powder in the Krag-Jorgensen cartridges.

In actual practice during the Cuban war our guns made the better showing.

Much has been said about the use of explosive bullets during the Cuban war. No well authenticated cases of such use can be found either in this or any other war. In fact to those having a fair knowledge of modern warfare the use of such a bullet is deemed inefficient. Arms or bullets which kill outright are less desirable than those which disable or wound. If a soldier is disabled and carried to the rear he is a source of care and expense. If he is killed outright, he is of no further care to the enemy.

It has been truthfully asserted that the Spanish soldiers were in the habit of cutting off the points of the bullets, or sometimes grooving the points with a knife to compel them to flatten at the end, or "mushroom" when they hit an object. This is deemed an undesirable practice for the reason that a bullet thus treated is rendered uncertain in trajectory and range and of doubtful effect.

Quite a consternation has often been created in the enemy's camp by the use of "whistling bullets." By cutting a slit and raising a tongue from the side of a bullet it makes a very sharp, whistling sound as it passes through the air. The uninitiated usually seek cover when they hear these little birds sing for the first time.

Steel-coated cartridges are regarded with great favor by the best authorities. The coating is so thin that it compresses into the rifle-threads of the barrel, and is sufficiently thick to prevent stripping off and thus permit the lead of the bullet to clog and foul the gun.

FOOD SEASONINGS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HAVE you ever thought of the many remote countries represented in the food set before you at an ordinary meal? If not, suppose you make a note of the courteous entertainers who strive to make your hour at dinner table agreeable and pleasant, and in imagination travel with them over the route from their homes to yours. Recollect all you can about their history and conditions and surroundings; even old friends usually grow on one with familiarity.

Pepper and salt are perhaps the most noticeable among them. These wellnigh universal spices have been long known and valued, and are among the most ancient of our entertainers. Pepper comes from the forests of Travancore and Malabar, whence it has been taken for culture to Java, Sumatra, Borneo, the Malay Peninsula, Siam, the Philippine Islands and the West Indies. For a long period the commerce between India and Venice, Genoa, and the commercial cities of Europe were indebted to it for a large part of their wealth. So great indeed was its value that in the Middle Ages the Portuguese were induced to seek a searoute to India to obtain it; and so exalted that in 408 it became an article of tribute, Alaric demanding three thousand pounds as part of the ransom of Rome. Penaug, Hanan, and Johore produce large quantities of it in the East, for which Singapore is now the great emporium; while tropical Africa is supplied from its native product, the Ashantee variety.

Salt is more widely distributed, and appears to occur in nearly every formation except the primary rock. Formerly, the salt of commerce was produced entirely from evaporation of sea-water, and this is still done on the seaboard. Now, probably more than half of the salt manufactured in the world comes from land deposits. Europe's famous salt-rock districts are the Carpathians, the Austrian and Bavarian Alps, West Germany, the Vosges, the Jura, the Swiss Alps, the Pyrenees and Spanish mountains, British salt deposits, and isolated deposits, and springs in Russia, Turkey and Italy; while America has inexhaustible supplies at many points. It is estimated that the entire ocean, if dried up, would yield nearly a million cubic miles of rocksalt, or about fourteen and a half times the bulk of the entire continent of Europe above high-water mark, mountain masses and all.

In the early history of the world salt was often unattainable, and even now there are places in Central Africa and other remote places where none but the rich can use it. The Odyssey speaks of inlanders who did not even know of the sea, or of salt. In parts of America and India salt was first introduced by Europeans; and incense, the chief economic and religious necessaries of the ancient world, play a great part in all we know of the ancient highways of commerce. In the United States much of our salt is obtained from mines along the Ohio River and in New York State.

The Banda Islands are chiefly known to us through their nutmegs, of which we consume more than all the rest of the western world. Almost the entire surface of the Island is planted with nutmeg trees. The warmer parts of Asia, from an early period, have been the seat of the culture of ginger, which the Greeks

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

A FEW words about the headline will not come amiss before we begin the readings. This line refers principally to the brain power or intellect. It may rise from three different points from the Mount of Jupiter, which is the best of all; from the commencement of the line of life, or from the Mount of Mars within the lifeline. If it begins on Jupiter and is long, touching the lifeline, the subject will have excellent energy and boundless ambition combined with reason. If the line rises on Jupiter and is slightly separated from the lifeline, the subject will have the same characteristics but will be more hasty and impetuous. If the headline and lifeline are widely separated the subject will be foolhardy and apt to overdo things.

If the line of head is connected with the lifeline at the beginning and somewhat twisted, a more sensitive disposition is shown; while if it rises on the Mount of Mars within the lifeline a fretful, worrying temperament is indicated and the subject will be more or less irritable. A straight, clear and even line gives common sense and a material mind. If the lower half slopes slightly there will be a balance between the imaginative and the practical; if the whole line slopes the subject will be romantic and imaginative and if it terminates in a fork on the Mount of Luna the subject will make a good novelist. If the lifeline is long and straight, going directly to the side of the hand, great brain power is combined with selfishness. If the line is long and curves upward on the Mount of Mars the subject will be a money-maker but a hard taskmaster. A very short line denotes a man very practical and entirely lacking in the imaginative facilities. If the line is full of hairlines and islands there is danger of brain disease, and if it terminates in an island it shows a brain trouble of which the patient will never recover. If the line turns and sends a branch to any mount, it partakes of the qualities of that line.

EXCELL.

"Excell" wants to know the meaning of the headline when dividing in the middle of the hand, one branch continuing over the Mount of the Moon and the other running down to the lifeline to the Mount of Venus. It would mean that while the person has an imaginative and idealistic turn of mind he would also partake of the characteristics of the Mount of Venus, which would give affection, sympathy, benevolence, love of beauty and color, a desire to please and a fondness for the other sex. A star on the mount of Venus indicates extraordinary success in all affairs of love; if it is in the centre of the mount it will give success in all things.

"Excell" sends his hand which is a very good one. It indicates a person of excellent character and right tendencies. A long life is indicated and many travels, especially in the latter part of the life. The early part of the life has seen a good deal of bad health but that improves as time goes on. There was an early love affair ending at about the age of twenty with some grief to the subject; it was for the best however, and he sees it now. Another love affair, which may or may not mean marriage, comes at about the age of twenty-five and continues for about twelve or fifteen years. The most fortunate one, however, comes late in life, the subject marrying at about forty-five. After this he will travel a good deal and will have an exceptionally happy married life. In a business way he has an exceptionally good hand. He will have good judgment and success will attend all he does, especially after thirty or thirty-five. He would make an excellent orator or public speaker or would be successful in politics. He is not very ambitious, but if he were he might succeed as a teacher or a lawyer. He should be a good singer, fond of music and of pictures. There are several stars in his hand all of which are favorable and one in the centre which denotes great success.

"J. G. B." has a hand of different type showing an affectionate earnest nature with an even temperament and rather domestic in taste. The subject is very high minded and would scorn to do a mean or dishonorable action. She will have two marriages; one at about the age of twenty, which will last until she is thirty-five, when she will be left a widow; the second marriage will take place about seven years later and will be to a man of wealth. This subject is very gifted in music and would make a talented opera singer if she chose. Her domestic tastes, however, will keep her at home as she would prefer to marry and settle down than to make a career for herself. She will have two children by her first marriage, who will live to be a comfort to her; but she will be happier in her second than in her first marriage. On the whole, a very favorable and decidedly fortunate hand.

"Stranger" sends a plaster cast also which indicates a strictly feminine character belonging to a small and pretty woman; one who has many friends and is much admired. In some ways her hand is remarkable and indicates an unusual career. She is very ambitious and will live to be very distinguished as the result of her ambition. A good thing about her is that she has the courage and perseverance necessary to go ahead and try to be whatever she wishes to be. Her head and lifeline are sufficiently separated at first to give her energy, courage and perseverance. Her health will be good and she will have strength to carry out whatever she undertakes. She is of a nervous temperament but keeps herself under control. Her lifeline ends with a star, a sure sign that she will be famous and distinguished some day. There is a cross and a square on Jupiter, both of which are excellent signs; and the fateline, which is unusually even, starts from a star at the bottom of the lifeline; these are all uncommon and exceptionally good prognostications. There are also signs of wealth especially in old age but I think she will either inherit it or make it herself rather than to marry for wealth. There is a love affair very early in life, but there are two griefs which come before the age of twenty-five which cause her considerable trouble; after that she is free from griefs of that sort. There is a star on the Mount of Apollo which indicates brilliancy and wealth. Her celebrity is won through talent; she will probably some day be famous although this may not bring her happiness. I think there will be a dramatic side to her life and that she will have very interesting adventures. She will very much be sought after by the opposite sex, but will keep a cool head and will be quite able to take care of herself. She has a talent for the occult if she chooses to develop it, but would rather work in some particular line as a musician, or perhaps as an actress. On the whole, she has a fortunate as well as an interesting hand.

STRANGER.

There are several hands this month that are unmarked in any way and unaccompanied by letters so it is impossible to tell where they came from. I have also two letters from persons wishing to have their hands read and saying they enclosed smoked paper impressions which has not been done. Please be more careful when writing to this department and look after these details; also in living up to the requirements for having the hand read.

Drunkenness Cured.

It is now Within the Reach of Every Woman to Save the Drunkard.

MR. JOHN M. HATTON.

Mrs. John M. Hatton of Lebanon, Ohio, said to our reporter a short time ago "I rescued my husband from the terrible liquor habit by a remedy known as Golden Specific. I used it without his knowing anything about it and cured him against his will. It is a marvelous result and only goes to show that drunkenness, when considered as a disease can be cured but when it is handled as an immoral craving susceptible to sentiment it cannot be cured. The remedy is put up by Dr. J. W. Haines, 863 Glenn Building, Cincinnati, O., and to every woman who writes him he will send a free trial package of Golden Specific so she can see what it is and how easily it can be used in tea, coffee, milk, chocolate or food, without the knowledge of the patient. I sent for the free trial of Golden Specific because it suggested that I might use it secretly in my husband's food. He had been a hard drinker for years. I tried all sorts of schemes and made every effort I could to reform him but he seemed to be entirely lost to the influence of liquor and I turned to Golden Specific more out of hope than anything else. The results were all I could have prayed for and I honestly believe this remedy will cure any drunkard no matter how depraved he may be. I am firmly convinced that if other women will send to Dr. Haines for a free trial of this noble remedy they will succeed in their efforts just as I did and thus have the dollars for the home, food, clothing and the children's education instead of their going into the till of the saloon keeper. It's certainly enough to interest every woman who in any way suffers by this horrible liquor curse to write for the free trial package and give it a test.

THE PHLANDERS' RATS.

A TRUE STORY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

"I SHOULD like very much to know who has been cutting the balls off the curtain cords," said Lucy Phlanders at the breakfast table one morning.

"I'll bet it's the kid," said her brother, meaning thereby the Phlanders' hopeful aged two.

"Thomas," said his father in an unusually stern voice, "did you cut the balls off the curtain cords?"

"Yes, papa," whimpered Master Thomas, and therewith hid his head and shed copious tears.

"I don't believe he did."

"Humph," said Phlanders, taking refuge in his paper. He didn't relish the idea of buying a dozen or so new curtain cords every week.

The Phlanders had been in their new house about two weeks, and Mrs. Phlanders was just priding herself on having everything settled and the house in perfect order, when her brother Jim noticed one morning, that the little silk balls, that finished off the cords on the window shades, had apparently been cut off in a number of places.

Later in the morning on which the above recorded conversation took place, Lucy took Tommy in her lap and giving him a pair of scissors, and a piece of cloth, told him to cut it. Just as she expected, the youngster had not the slightest idea how to handle the scissors, and she was convinced that he had not cut off the balls.

"Well," said Phlanders, when she told him of her experiment with Tommy and the scissors, "it must be rats then, because I never heard of ghosts being in a new house."

"Oh, Tom, you don't really think there are any rats in this house do you?" and the tremor in Lucy's voice plainly showed that she did not relish the idea.

"I don't see how there can be," said Tom, half to himself, because the house is built ratproof, and then we should have heard them if they were around. But what has become of the curtain balls, if neither Tommy nor the rats took them?"

"I don't know," said his wife, and Tom didn't either.

Two or three evenings later, on returning from an entertainment, Lucy threw the roses she had been wearing into a basin of water, intending to leave them over night. To her surprise when she went for them in the morning, not a vestige of a rose could she find there.

"What in the world has become of my roses Tom?" she asked.

"What roses?"

"Why the ones I wore last night. I put them in the basin when I came home, and now they are not here."

"Then you didn't put them there," said the imperturbable Tom.

"Of course I did."

"Well, my dear, it stands to reason that if you put them there last night, they would be there now. You probably left them in the dressing room, when you put your wraps on last night."

"Well I guess——" but what is the use of repeating the conversation that ensued. Tom and Lucy both had positive natures, and though they were very fond of each other, it sometimes happened, as on this occasion that they had little quarrels. To be sure Tom kissed Lucy before he went to the office, but it was a ceremonious kiss, and didn't mean that he had receded from his position. However as he left his office that evening his thoughts wandered back to the events of the morning.

"I suppose Lucy really thought she put those flowers in the basin," he thought. "But of course she didn't, and she knows as well as I that no one could come in and take them away without our hearing them. I ought not to have contradicted her so flatly though, for that always makes her mad."

Just then he happened to look up and saw he was passing a florist's shop, and seeing some roses in the window, it occurred to him to take some home to Mrs. Phlanders as a peace offering. Lucy had had her little soliloquy too, and was all ready to be forgiven, when she opened the door for Tom, and so the little quarrel was ended by a kiss, and without further words on either side.

However, to show that the incident had not passed entirely from her mind, Mrs. Phlanders took one of the roses from the vase, and calling to her husband, said: "Tom I want you to see me put this rose in the basin where I put the others last night."

"Now," she added, as she dropped the flower into the water, "we shall see whether it will be there in the morning."

"I'll bet you five it will be right there," said Tom.

Before breakfast next morning, Lucy took Tom to the basin where they had deposited the rose on the previous night, but no rose could they find.

"Well I'll be hanged," exclaimed Tom with more emphasis than the occasion demanded. "Who would suppose that a rat could take away a rose, to say nothing of a dozen last night," he added.

"Now aren't you sorry for what you said to me yesterday?" said Mrs. Tom, preparing for the usual osculatory embrace—and she got it.

A week passed and nothing more was heard from the rats, until one evening Mrs. Lucy was seated alone in the library, when suddenly there came a noise that sounded as though an army was tramping over head.

"My heart jumped into my throat, and I know I turned as white as a sheet," she said, speaking of it later to her husband.

"Finally," she continued, "It sounded as though the army was coming down-stairs. I jumped up and screamed, but still they came on and on until the noise stopped, as suddenly as it had begun."

"I guess we will have to set a trap for those rats right away," said Tom. "There must have been three or four to make as much noise as you say they did."

"Three or four Tom! why there were a hundred, and I tell you I won't stay in this house another minute with them."

"Well a hundred is a great many my dear, but I guess we can catch them all in a couple of nights."

Accordingly on the following night, three brand new traps were baited with toasted cheese and set temptingly for the rats, but in the morning they were as empty as when they were first bought. The same experiment was tried each night for a week, but with the same result, for it seemed that the rats preferred to spend the nights tramping up and down between the floor and partitions. Mrs. Phlanders was nearly frantic, and Tom himself began to have a queer feeling of unrest.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he said one morning at the end of the week, "I just think I'll get a couple of ferrets."

"Well if you have any pity on me, get something, and get it quick, for I shall die of fright if I have to go through another night like the last seven. You have been talking about ferrets for three days, why don't you get them?"

"I'll get something to-day to down those rats with, or my name is not Tom Phlanders."

It happened that afternoon that Lucy was entertaining one of her neighbors in the library, which is rather dark in the day time, and they were discussing the rat question, when suddenly Miss C—— exclaimed, "Why there goes one of your ferrets now."

Lucy made a jump and landed on top of her chair, with her skirts nearly to her knees, just as a huge rat ran past, and darted into the fire place.

"Ferret!" said Lucy, "that's a rat."

Miss C—— screamed and looked as though she wanted to faint. As soon as they dared, both the ladies gathered their skirts about them and beat a hasty retreat into a lighter room.

Lucy confronted Tom at the front door that evening, and barring the entrance said. "Did you bring those ferrets home?"

"No," said Tom, trying to pass her, "but —"

"Then you can take me to a hotel; I will not stay in this house another minute."

"But my dear ——"

"Oh, I know, you forgot or something, but I don't care if you did, I'm not going to stay here and be eaten alive by rats."

"You don't understand me ——"

"Yes I do Tom Phlanders, I haven't lived with you five years for nothing, and I know that you are the biggest procrastinator in the city."

"For heaven's sake do give me a chance to say something," said Tom, getting exasperated. "I didn't get any ferrets," continued Tom, as his wife seemed disposed to keep quiet a moment," but I did engage a rat-catcher to come and rid the house of the pests."

"A rat-catcher, what kind of a rat-catcher?"

"I never heard of more than one kind, and this one is like all others, a man."

"Well, I never heard of a man rat-catcher before, except the Pied Piper of Hamelin. How does he catch them?" said Lucy.

"I'm sure I don't know, but if you'll let me in I'll teil you all about it."

"When is he coming?" said Lucy, opening the door and allowing her husband to enter.

"He is coming to-night at nine o'clock and he stays until three, and I had to pay him thirty dollars to come for three nights. He says he thinks he can catch them all in that time."

Tom delivered this information at long range, and evaded further questions by rushing upstairs to dress for dinner.

A little before nine Mr. Rat-catcher arrived, accompanied by an assistant. He was a funny little man, scarcely more than five feet tall, and his face and manner somehow reminded you of rats and reptiles. He proceeded to dress himself from head to toe in a suit of red flannel, and on his feet were red flannel stockings, padded so thickly on the soles that you could not hear him walking two feet away. He had sprinkled a little oil of rhoderun over himself to make him smell like a rat he said. His only tools were a pair of tongs with long handles, a gunny sack and a dark lantern.

He seemed to know instinctively where the rat holes were and after visiting them all he selected one, and made the room perfectly dark; then he stooped down in front of the hole, and made a noise like a rat. Pretty soon Mr. Rat came running to the hole, and then the rat-catcher opened the slide of his dark lantern and threw the light right in Mr. Rat's eyes, dazzling him. Having quieted his victim for a moment, he reaches down with his tongs and fastens them on the rat, just at the root of his tail.

A few minutes later Mr. and Mrs. Phlanders were startled by seeing this red impish-looking man appear in the doorway of the library, holding a huge rat in his tongs, and exclaiming:

"Here's yer first boarder Mr. Phlanders."

That night he caught eight rats, and on each of the two succeeding nights he caught four. He told Phlanders that he thought he had them all, "but to make sure," he said, "you had better stop up all the holes but one and set a trap there." So Phlanders told his man Charles to do this, and he, having heard of the achievement of the rat-catcher, armed himself with a small pair of tongs, and sat down to watch the trap.

He had not long to wait, before out comes Mr. Rat, and puts his foot in it. Snap! goes the trap, and then up springs Charles, and grabs him, not by the root, but by the end of his tail. Woe to Charles! the rat turned quick as a flash and set his teeth in Mr. Charles' wrist. Charles dropped the rat, and the rat dropped Charles, and made for the coal bin, where he was finally captured, as he was trying to gnaw his leg off to free himself from the trap.

and Romans received by way of the Red Sea, and which was an important item in commerce between Europe and Asia in the Middle ages. The Spice Islands, in the same archipelago, have given to the world few things more popular than those unopened flowers of a tree, smoked and dried in the sun, which we call cloves; but which were named clavus in Latin, from their resemblance to a nail.

Caraway, so much used as a flavoring in cooking, and in drinks, cheese, cakes, and bread, comes from the northern and central parts of Europe and Asia. Dill is a native of Egypt, the south of Europe, and the Cape of Good Hope, but is also cultivated in many other places. It is used in pickles and flavoring. The origin of chervil, used in soups, is unknown. Sweet marjoram is a native of Portugal and the East. Cumin belongs to upper Egypt, and in the Middle Ages was one of the commonest spices in Europe. Vanilla is made from the capsules of Vanilla planifolia and Vanilla claviculata, natives of tropical America. Saffron was originated and cultivated in Persia and Kashmir, and carried by the Mongol invasion into China, where it is employed in cookery. Hindoos mix it with spices, and Persians and Spaniards with rice.

Assafetida is not popular with us, but is relished as a condiment in Persia and India, its native habitats, as also in France in cookery. Tumeric is very ancient, and is in much demand at home. It belongs to Southern India. The ravensara nut, of Madagascar, is also used as a spice. Other spices not popular with us, but finding approval at home, are the curry leaf and chironjie nuts of India; the juice of the tamarind tree, of the East Indies; and galingale, from the Chinese island of Hanan, mentioned by Marco Polo, and introduced into Europe by Arabian physicians. Russians like it as a flavor in their liquors, and the Tartars give their tea a new zest with it.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.

In Hamburg dogs are taxed according to size.

THREE HUNDRED PER CENT. PROFIT. A MONEY MAKER FOR AGENTS.

The ordinary store keeper can feel proud when he makes twenty per cent. on sales; but when you handle the Magical Sponge, which you will notice advertised in another column of this paper, you cannot make less than one hundred per cent. and can easily clear three hundred per cent. profit. It is the neatest and greatest seller ever seen and sells itself. Just look at a few orders within a few days and see how it goes. These are not selected orders, but a few picked out of the heap, all haphazard, just to give you an idea and encourage you in taking hold and winning your fortune. Here was Joshua Crosby, East Weymouth, Mass., ordered a gross, February 23rd, and on the 12th of March ordered another. That's nearly $52.00 clear (simply paid Exp. charges out of it), just for a little work done at odd times in a few days. Mrs. J. Cartwel, Milford, Ill., on April 2nd sent for 6 dozen and on the 7th sent for a whole gross. There's thirty-nine dollars cleared up in a few days. Almon L. Reed, Benton Station, Maine, sold a dozen. Annie T. Silvey, Stevensville, Mont., ordered five dozen in less than a month. Mrs. John Abbott, Georgiaville, R. I., had 3 dozen sent her March 19th, and on April 3rd had a whole gross. A. E. Bryson, Oakdale, Pa., a dozen one day and right after 3 dozen, and so on through a whole pile of correspondence and orders, all telling how easy it is to sell the Magical Sponge, and how anxious people are to get it when they see what it will do. Many agents after showing the work of the sponge, easily sell from 3 to one dozen sponges in an office, or a building, while it is no trouble to sell them on the street, in shops, factories and houses as fast as you can handle them. Remember that every sale means large profit and never less than one hundred per cent. clear, which just doubles your money, while you can with a little energy and push, make six dollars on every dollar invested. You will notice we give you a sample to start you if you send for a subscription to "COMFORT" to-day.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

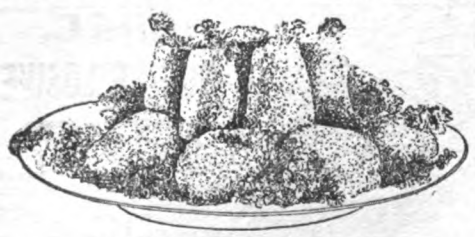
THE Queen of England, a royal housewife indeed, sets an example to all who have a household under their charge—for she is exceedingly particular as to cleanliness and order, in all of her numerous establishments, superintending all in a really wonderful manner, when it is taken into consideration that one of her homes—Windsor—has two thousand employes and dependents, and yet the greatest harmony prevails. Her Majesty is a kind mistress, and any servant who conscientiously performs his or her duties is sure of a place for life.

When we think of those women in less lofty station who have no time, so they say, to keep up their girlhood accomplishments, after marriage—no time for reading, study, or otherwise improving themselves and keeping up to the times, and then think of this woman who has the affairs of a great nation upon her shoulders and yet not only arranges the details of her great households and looks carefully after them, but in past years has kept up with her music, painting, reading and out-door accomplishments—then do we realize what a wonderful woman she is and feel quite ashamed of our own shortcomings with such an example of the true housewife to follow. Just because she has a great income is no reason, in her eyes, why she should not practice economy, and so she does, like any other thrifty and sensible housewife—paying her bills as she goes, wasting nothing and calling forth the admiration of all who are conversant with the facts.

Now that the value of fruits for a diet is so generally recognized, a suggestion as to the use of some of the common kinds, to which the majority of people have access, may be of value.

The apple is such a common fruit that very few people realize how efficacious are its medicinal properties—and yet every one should know that the very best thing one can do is to eat an apple just before retiring. It is excellent brain food on account of the large amount of phosphoric acid in easily digested shape; it excites the action of the liver and promotes healthful sleep. It is also a remedy for rheumatism, and aids digestion.

The lemon probably contains more valuable properties than any other fruit—as the rind, the juice and the oil are all very useful for food and medicine.



The banana is the daily bread of the inhabitants of the tropics, providing an abundance of nutrition. It is said that a given space of ground planted with bananas would produce one hundred and thirty-three times as much food substance as the same area sowed with wheat.

How many of our readers know exactly what rennet is, what it is for, and how it is made? It is made from the glutinous membrane covering the stomach of the calf, which is prepared to form a thick jelly-like substance. This is dissolved in alcohol and then is passed through a filter, and the result is a clear preparation known as rennet. It is most nutritious for dyspeptics and persons of weak digestion, and is also used by perfectly well persons, as a most delicious dish is made from milk thickened by rennet.

Regarding suggestions to the housewife, of which we spoke in our last Chats—re-curling ostrich feathers is something we all have to do occasionally. The best way to do this is to sprinkle a little salt over the feather before attempting to curl it; then hold it over a register or radiator until it is full of hot air, and then draw each tendril carefully over a blunt paper knife, or case knife. Don't try to curl them too tightly, as it is better to do them often, and so let them have the soft, drooping effect, so much more desirable than the tight curl.

Scorched linen may be restored to its proper shade by dampening it and laying it on the grass to bleach; it may be necessary to do this several times, but the stain will eventually disappear.

Bear in mind that an upright piano gives forth its best tone if placed at least two inches from a wall; also that no ornaments should be placed upon the top, as they deaden the sound and frequently produce a jarring noise. Never place a piano against an outside wall, for the cold and dampness are injurious; neither place it too near a register, radiator or stove, as not only the tone will be impaired, but also the case; put it, if possible, where the temperature is even at all times, and try to have it tuned twice a year, as this will keep it in good condition and so make it last for years—while a piano that is neglected in this respect will soon lose its purity of tone.

A small quantity of borax water should be poured down the kitchen sink each day, after the work is done; this will wash down all particles of matter collected in the pipe and keep it sweet, as borax is a well-known disinfectant.

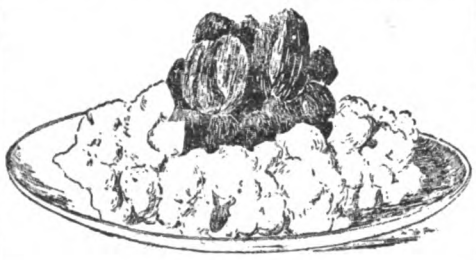
To prevent the shrinkage of flannel, put it while new into clear cold water and let it remain for a week, changing the water frequently. Then wash in warm water, using a little soap. Flannel thus washed never hardens nor shrinks.

To make a cement for china, beat lime into the finest powder, sift it through muslin and then tie some in a thin muslin. Apply to the edges of the china to be mended the white of egg and then dust the lime quickly on it and unite the pieces exactly.

One of the best ways of keeping cheese moist is to wrap it in damp butter muslin and keep it in a cool place.

To clean velvet, scrape pipeclay into a fine powder over the velvet and then brush it off lightly; this will raise the pile and improve the color.

We illustrate this month chicken and sweetbread croquettes, which are made as follows:



Cook, cool and chop the sweetbread, and add enough chopped chicken to make a pint in all. To one-fourth cup melted butter add one-half cup flour and cook until frothy; then add, stirring all the time, one cup chicken stock and one-third cup thin cream. Season with salt and pepper, add one well-beaten egg and the chopped meat. Cool and shape, roll in egg and bread crumbs and fry in deep fat. Garnish with parsley.

CHEESE STICKS.

Mix three cups of grated cheese, two tablespoons flour, one teaspoon salt and a few grains cayenne. Add to this the whites of six eggs beaten until stiff. Roll on a board, shaping into short sticks; roll in crumbs and fry in deep fat.

Cheese sticks are usually served with the salad course, particularly with lettuce dressed with French dressing.

Two dainty desserts are stuffed figs and pineapple foam. For the former, select fine washed figs and make an opening in the side of each and fill in with a teaspoonful of chopped nut meats. Close the opening and boil the figs until tender. Five minutes before removing from the fire add a little sugar and the juice of half a lemon—to one pound of figs. Pile in the center of a dish and around the edge put sweetened and flavored whipped cream.

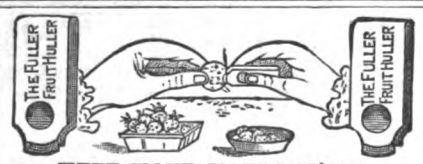
PINEAPPLE FOAM.



Prepare and grate a small pineapple. Beat one cup thick cream until stiff. Beat the whites of two eggs and gradually beat into them half a cup of powdered sugar; then fold in one cup thick cream beaten stiff and the grated pineapple. The juice of half a lemon should be added, as it improves the flavor. Chill and serve in glass cups.

It is said of the great singer, Sembrich, that she once, when living in Vienna, starved herself to hear Patti sing. She was, at the time, among the poorest of the poor, but so great was her longing to hear the wonderful voice of this gifted woman that she set herself seriously to work to invent ways and means to gratify her desire. She had no jewelry or anything else which she could sell, and in her little pocket-book was only barely enough to keep her in food for the two days that remained of the week. But she resolved to devote this to a ticket to the concert even if she had to go without food to pay for it. So she bought a loaf of stale bread and four potatoes, and with the remainder of her money she went to the opera house, and for six hours stood patiently in a long line of people, and at the end of this time was rewarded by getting a seat high up in the family circle. But she heard Patti, and nothing else mattered any more. She starved her body contentedly for a week while she fed her soul on her memories of Patti's glorious voice.

It was once customary in France, when a guest had worn out his welcome, for the host to serve him with a cold shoulder of mutton, instead of a hot roast. This was the origin of the phrase "to give the cold shoulder."

Every family in the land wants one or more. All you do to sell them is simply show the lady of the house or the office man how it works on his window and you will depart with one less every time, but in its place a quarter.

The Magical Sponge differs from the ordinary sponge in nature, while the common sponge is of vegetable origin and found in the ocean, the Magical Sponge is a mineral production and found in the United States, dug from the ground, carefully prepared and manufactured into sponges for the Housekeeper, Merchant, Liveryman, Metal Workers, and all persons who desire to keep their homes, offices, and business places in a clean and healthy condition.

No Soap or water is needed or even used with the Magical Sponge for Cleaning Windows or any outside Metal. In the winter time it has no equal, it does not freeze, and no water being used (other than what is in the sponge) all trouble and hard work is avoided. For Cleaning Baseboards, Window Sills, Wainscoating and painted surfaces, it acts like a charm; takes all the finger marks, spots, grease and dirt away, leaving a Clean, Polished Surface.

Some Unconquered Spaniards.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IN the most northern part of Spain, where the Pyrenees dip into the Bay of Biscay, is the country of the Basques, the unconquered Spaniards. These are the people of whom Cæsar, in his account of his conquest of Spain, writes, "a few pretty people, higher up in the mountains, did not make submission or send hostages." The Roman poets called these people Iberians, and pictured them as almost supernatural, whom neither hunger, heat, cold, nor armies could conquer, and whose greatest joy was facing peril.

The Basques of to-day bear the stamp of this ancient people; in character, disposition, language and customs, they are entirely different from the Spaniards south of them and indeed they can be classed with no other race of the earth. Their earliest ancestors were probably the cave dwellers of the Alps and Pyrenees, whose bones are found in the caverns of the mountains, together with the remains of those gigantic animals which were the ancestors of our present quadrupeds. Only in this tiny country, among the mountains, have these sturdy, stalwart people succeeded in retaining anything of their own individuality. If this is their true origin, their earliest ancestors must have lived twenty centuries before Christ, and have been surrounded by a country different in physical features, and covered with plants and animals which have long since ceased to exist. Since those days long ago, their whole force has been used in fighting their way in the world, in trying to preserve their racial distinction. All previous to the Roman conquest of Spain is, as far as Basque history is concerned, a blank. Even the Romans found it impossible to conquer these sons of the mountains, who, when hard pressed by armies, or beseiged in their fortified towns, dashed themselves from the highest rocks, and died by their own hands rather than surrender. At length Cæsar, with great wisdom, made them his allies, since they would not become his slaves. As followers of his army they left their mountain homes and often the tide of battle and, indeed, the trend of history has been turned by their boldness and courage. A few centuries later, it was the Basques who fell upon the army of Charlemagne and brought death and disaster to the cause of the Franks. But no sooner had they established their claim to liberty with their northern neighbors than they were met by the Saracens, who had crossed into Spain from Africa. In overcoming these usurpers, the Basques took so active a part that they were all ennobled and now there is but one class among the Basques; to be a Basque is to belong to the nobility.

When the late queen, Isabella, came to the throne, the Basques sent to her the following message: "Senora, in a little corner of your kingdom is a people few, living in a poor and rugged region; we will be loyal to you, if you will, as we beg you to do, respect our fueros (parliaments) and the freedom which has never been impaired."

The Basque language is unlike any European tongue and is, in fact, almost unique, for it can scarcely be classed with any other language nor is any other allied to it. It is highly inflected, each word and even each letter of the alphabet being capable of change to express many different ideas. Students of the Basque language tell us that although it is the hardest of tongues to learn, it is the richest of languages. Until the fifteenth century there was no written Basque so, of course, the literature is quite unimportant. This is a matter of much regret for had this people written traditions of the far away centuries they might throw much light upon those early days.

There are three Basque Provinces, Biscay (Vizcaya), Guiprizcoa, and Alava. Each province has its parliament, chosen by its own people and there is also a parliament of the three, which decides the general policy of the people and deals with the Spanish government.

In the mountains there are rich mines of iron, lead and zinc and the valleys are sufficiently fertile to yield grain of various kinds. Along the sea coast the fisheries are extensive.

Perhaps the strongest characteristic of the Basque nature is his deeply religious instinct and his superstitious awe of natural forces. He seems at one time to have been a pure nature worshipper and now that spirit is caught and held in his Christian observances. Yet the Basque says, "We were always Christians." In parts of the provinces are still performed miracle plays, like the noted performance of Oberammergau, the subjects being taken from the Bible or from the legends of ancient Basque romance. It is considered a great privilege to be allowed to take part, and large sums are often paid for the honor.

Such are these brave Basques, Spaniards in name only; their history reaching far back into the dim days before history was, and their character changing but little as the centuries pass. In spite of all, and through all they have kept their liberty, their unity, though they have perhaps done so at the price of progress.

TORTOISE SHELL.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

TORTOISE shell is one of those commodities whose intrinsic value is such that the real article will never be cheap. Beautiful in itself, rare and difficult to obtain, it will probably never be so common or of so little value as are silver articles at the present time.

The tortoise shell of commerce is the shell or epidermis plates of the hawkbill turtle—Eretmochelys imbricate—a species of turtle which inhabits tropical seas. This outer shell is in thin plates, beautifully mottled and shaded; these are removed from the living animal by subjecting it to a slow heat which loosens the plates, thus allowing a thin knife to be slipped beneath them. When thus removed they are curved and irregular in form, but are easily flattened by heat and pressure, and all irregularities are rasped away. They become very plastic when heated, and as the heat also softens and liquifies a sort of film or gum on their surface they can be readily welded and pressed together while warm, and so made of an increased thickness.

The quality of tortoise shell depends mainly on the thickness and size of the scales, and secondly on the clearness and brilliancy of the colors. The best tortoise shell is that obtained in the Indian Ocean, near Ceylon; but most of that which is made in New York comes from Cuba and South America.

Tortoise shell has been a highly-prized material for ornamental purposes from very early times. It was one of the most esteemed of the treasures of the far East brought to ancient Rome by way of Egypt, and it was eagerly sought by wealthy Romans as a veneer for their rich furniture. At present it is much used in the inlaying of cabinet work known as buhl furniture, and for combs, hairpins, knife handles, eyeglass frames, and many other small articles it is highly valued. It is of late closely imitated by a preparation of horn, which, when new and fresh, is difficult to distinguish from the real article. Indeed, there have been several deft imitations of tortoise shell—compositions of celluloid and other ordinary substances, overlaid and intermingled with a small amount of the genuine shell, which are well calculated to deceive the inexperienced buyer, and which cost far less than the genuine shell, which is very expensive.

A tiny box for lip salve, less than two inches in diameter, beautifully mottled and polished, but perfectly plain, brings seven dollars; a larger one, suited for my Lady's powder puff, costs her or her admirer the small sum of fifty dollars. Exquisite photograph frames, carved and polished, may be had for twelve or fifteen dollars. Fans with tortoise shell sticks, either carved or plain are "all the rage" at present, but one needs to be a millionaire to indulge in them to any great extent, as a single specimen costs anywhere from twenty-five to five hundred dollars.

Amber tortoise shell is much more sought after to-day than the darker shades. It is newer in fashion, and more difficult to procure, as there is but little of it. It is taken from the under side of the animal, and comes off in thin, scaly pieces, harder to work than the shell which is taken from the back. The amber shell is of almost uniform color, varying only with the age of the tortoise. It has none of the beautiful mottling and veining that form the chief beauty of the darker shell, and so is not nearly as handsome. Its scarcity and its consequent high price being the sole reason for its being sought after.

HOW DOES HE DO IT?

Prof. Weltmer's Unprecedented Success Continues to Dumbfound and Astonish the Scientific World.

No discovery of late years has created such a profound sensation as Prof. Weltmer's method of healing the sick.

PROF. WELTMER.

Medical and scientific men the world over stand aghast at the wonders being performed by this new and grand method. That it does the work has never been questioned for a single moment as prominent men and women everywhere endorse it. Rev. Jas. O. Swinney, founder of Pritchett College, Glasgow, Mo., after suffering for many months with bladder, stomach and prostatic troubles, and failing to get even relief through old time methods, was cured by this great healer. Mr. J. S. Small, Colfax, Ill., was totally deaf in his left ear for three years. Was fully restored by Prof. Weltmer in three days. Not only does Prof. Weltmer cure hundreds of people at his infirmary at Nevada, Mo., but he possesses the remarkable ability to cure at a distance, and does this with the same wonderful ease. Hon. T. T. Rodes, Prosecuting Attorney, Paris, Mo., was greatly afflicted with sciatic rheumatism. He was restored in 30 days by absent treatment. Mr. H. E. Rose, Novelty, Mo., had a large goitre on his neck that was literally choking him to death. It was removed in a single night by this eminent healer without seeing him. Thousands, all over the world, relieved in the same manner. This is positively the only known method that will restore lost vitality and kindred troubles. A copy of the Magnetic Journal, a forty page illustrated magazine, giving a list of the most miraculous cures on record, will be sent free to any sufferer.

TEACHES HIS ART TO OTHERS. Prof. Weltmer teaches his wonderful art to others, and it is the grandest and best paying profession of the age. Many of his students are making $10.00 to $50.00 per day. Taught by mail or personal instructions. Address, Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada. Mo., The American School of Magnetic Healing.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

A May day greeting to you all, my dears, and may your lives be full of buds to blossom into beauty and fragrance as the summer develops their growth. How the time flies, doesn't it? And how the summers run round on each others' heels. But there is no room for any talk except business, because there are so many of you this month.

The first one comes from Know Nothing, far away in Minnesota at Winstead, and she is worried because her sweetheart makes love to her, but gives her no ring, nor presents. Accept the attention of some other young man and let this one see some of the presents the other one gives you, and that will bring him around. Some men are stupid and some are stingy.

Fifteen and Sixteen, Monroe, Utah.—When a girl is of age, she can marry without her parents' consent, but it is not always best to do so. (2) There is no fixed age when people become old maids or old bachelors.

M. P. T., Waco, Texas.—Tell him it was your fault; explain it to him, and if he wants to he will come back.

A. B. C., Keyworth, Ills.—Brown and blue blend very richly and prettily for a combined wedding and traveling suit. A bride often wears a traveling gown at church, but as a rule a different dress is worn even though it is not a church wedding, as that term is generally understood. She would hardly carry flowers in any profusion.

V. A. T., Belfast, Me.—The wedding ring goes on the third finger of the left hand.

Genevieve, Mitchell, Ind.—It is proper for a young lady to visit the home of her sweetheart, when his sister is her intimate friend. (2) Don't give your picture to a young man unless with good reason. (3) Don't wear gloves at graduation unless all the other graduates do.

Rosebud, Palmerville, N. C.—A woman may marry a man younger than she is, but it is not best as a rule. (2) Engaged people may kiss each other. (3) There are many times when a daughter is justified in marrying without her parents' consent. (4) If a girl loves the man who proposes to her she ought to be able to answer him in about two minutes.

Lillie M., Lancaster, Ky.—Don't try to reduce your fat without consulting a physician. (2) It is safe in answering work advertisements to know what you are going to get before you pay out any money.

Black Jacks, Norman, Okla.—The lady can assist the young man on with his overcoat if he will let her; and so she can look after his hat. (2) The man usually precedes the woman unless she knows where the place is and he doesn't. (3) Ask a man to call again.

Brave Heart, Roseville, Cal.—Keep on trying to write acceptable matter. You don't know how or when some of it would be accepted. Try it on your local paper. Publishers usually have a fixed price for matter they accept.

Pansy H., Fairmount, Minn.—A girl of seventeen may accept the escort of a young man even though she may have an elder brother. (2) Write to any music publishing firm advertised in COMFORT or elsewhere.

Maud McL., Greencastle, Pa.—Write to Sup't. Cooper Union Woman's Art School, Cooper Institute, New York City for what you want to know about sculpture.

Two Sisters, Fruitport, Mich.—Young women of twenty may take evening strolls with well-selected young men, but not too often or too long. (2) Young men ought to be home by eleven. (3) Dancing in moderation is not harmful.

Curley, Cowlesville, N. Y.—I know of no firm, dear, that will buy your homemade crochet work. It is very hard to find "pleasant employment at home" and make a living at it.

Mary Agnes, Roscoe, N. Y.—The June-berry is the same as the service-berry. See the dictionary. Don't you mean Juniper berries instead of Jupiter berries?

Constance, London, Ont.—Gymnastics might add a little to your width, but scarcely to your height. You are just the right size, the way you are, if you want to be cute and catchy.

Little Lady, Chicago, Ills.—Other things being equal, marry the man who is five years older.

Leonora, DeSoto, La.—Apply to the minister of the church you attend to know about missionaries. It is the only way to find out. (2) Postage to China, Japan and Cuba, five cents an ounce.

The Twins, Redlands, Cal.—There is no such list of recent fiction that I know of. You can very easily get a dozen times as many good books as you can get time to read.

Sunday, Peoria, Ills.—Girls of eighteen do not wear their hair down, nor do they wear Tam O'Shanters, usually. There are so many pretty summer gowns that I do not know one from another to describe.

Daisy L., North Branch, Iowa.—It is probably the best way to take the seed out of the mouth with a fork or spoon. A sandwich is eaten by biting right into it and you may break off as much bread as you please. Those are things to be done in the most graceful way possible.

If Cousin Mamie, of Whitman, Mass., will write to L. H. Bissell, Effingham, Ills., she may learn something about photography that she wanted to know.

Monitta, Well, Minn.—See COMFORT advertisements for Stamp Photos. (2) No, a girl of seventeen and boy of twenty should not marry.

Frightened Heart, Marshall, Mich.—The only way to handle a man of that sort is to meet him with a shotgun or a dishpan full of scalding water.

Brown Eyes, Longview, Texas.—Simply say you will take his hat and coat, suiting the action to the word. (2) You may go to the door with him or not as you wish, but you should always ask him to call again. (3) Thank him and accept his escort when he asks you, that's all.

Sylvia, Quitman, Mo.—It is proper for the sitting person to rise upon an introduction. (2) A young man may assist the lady in taking off her jacket in church, or in putting it on. (3) Don't have your picture taken with a young man, and please don't say "have went."

R. J. F., Goldendale, Wash.—A gentleman may ask to be presented to the lady if it has been overlooked.

Curly Head, Baltimore, Md.—Be properly introduced to the young man or do not know him at all. (2) Always introduce the gentleman to the lady.

Gertrude, Girardville, Pa.—Do exactly as you please about asking your escort into the house, only don't ask him in if it is late, say ten thirty. (2) There is no way of getting rid of annoying men unless you call in the help of other men.

Millie Trent, Feitel, La.—Send your letter to the Admiral in care of the Navy Department, Washington. (2) Be slow about exchanging photographs with young men.

Butter Cup, Rush River, Minn.—The lady should be on the man's left, walking or riding. (2) Don't be too anxious about the bicycle boots being put on.

A. V. E., Salesville, Mont.—Weddings before justices or at preachers' houses are conducted about as the participants want to have them. Any way will do. (2) The husband gives the bride a present; the bride may give one if she wants to. (3) Husbands don't have wedding rings.

J. C., Louisville Ky.—Phrenology is a science. Talk to any reputable physician in your city.

Eva E., Chaplin, Ills.—Don't advertise. What is better is not to worry about having your palm read until you have money to pay for it with.

Sara and Maysie, Rosedale, Ohio.—Don't use an eyebrow penciller; it is bad. (2) The lady speaks first. (3) With your semi-blond hair you can wear almost any color.

Leona Belmont, Crown River, Minn.—Time, dear Cousin Leona, is a splinter from the sawlog of eternity. (2) There would be no sound unless the bell made vibrations sufficiently strong to reach where there was an ear to record the movement.

Fay, Lumber Pridge, N. C.—Better not write to the soldier for his photograph yet awhile. (2) The best age at which women should marry is between twenty and thirty.

Ignorant Girl, Cicero, Ind.—The gentleman may be your friend and you may call him so, but do not refer to him as a "gentleman friend." It has grown to be the Bowery style. (2) A lady may pass a pleasant word with the man in the store and she may not be a particle icy and frigid. Be a lady, that is enough.

Blanche, Springfield, Mo.—By all means, explain to the man exactly the situation, and set matters right.

There, that is all for this time. Some of the cousins will not find their letters here, but they will find their questions answered to some other cousin. Some again ask such silly questions about love and beaus that I am ashamed of them. Again let me ask the cousins not to ask so many questions at once. Some will send in a dozen questions, most of which have been already answered for them, if they would only read this column every month. Now dears, run along and play, and be as happy as you can. CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

SUMMER begins as the sun reaches the solstice, or first point of the sign Cancer. This occurs at about 24 minutes before 11 in the forenoon of the 21st day of June, this year. At the time Neptune, the sun and Mercury are all in the 10th house and Venus is near the cusp in the 9th house almost upon the south meridian. Mars has risen and is in the 12th house; Jupiter is in the second house; the moon is conjoined with Herschel in the 3rd house and Saturn is in the 4th house.

Mercury rules both the ascendant and midheaven, and is in the 10th in favorable aspect with both Mars and Jupiter, as also is the sun; the latter having almost the exact trine of the great benefic, stands in the house of the Nation's Treasury. This indicates the inflowing of liberal revenues and strong support to the National Administration and harmony between the governing authorities and the people.

Mars excites the military ardor and keeps alive the patriotic sentiment of the masses. Scholars and distinguished men meet with honor at the hands of the Government. There may be some scandalous developments growing out of private enmities between individuals in the civil government and the war service. There is also an indication of some bad pestilential disease during this quarter and the sanitary authorities are urged to be more than ever on the alert against the introduction of anything like yellow fever, especially during the latter part of the summer near the last days in August, being particularly careful that the United States Mails do not prove the channel through which some serious epidemic trouble is introduced. The last part of August seems to be peculiarly contributive to public excitement, and bad fires and explosions and railroad accidents are to be particularly guarded against at that time. There will be some trouble in our extreme northern possessions over disputed lands or boundaries and probably some serious conflict of armed men in those regions. Saturn in the 4th does not promise so favorably for the farming community in some sections and he is likely to give some cold and unproductive conditions such as to retard vegetation to some extent, particularly during the first two-thirds of June.

There will be two eclipses in June—a partial eclipse of the sun on the 8th and a total eclipse of the moon on the 23rd. Neither of these eclipses will be visible in Washington, our seat of government, though that of the sun is visible in Europe, Alaska, and the extreme northeastern part of Russia. The eclipse of the moon is visible in Asia and the Pacific Ocean. The indications from all these phenomena are that there will be some unusual strife in the northern regions of Europe and Asia and particularly in the Northeastern and Eastern part of Asia, probably Russia, Japan and China, with probability of bad floods and disturbing earth phenomena there.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JUNE, 1899.

JUNE. 1—Thursday. This day has but little to recommend it, and conditions bid thee pause before engaging in any matter of importance; give thy landlord a wide berth in the forenoon and noon hours, when all matters of real estate are best avoided. REGULUS desires to strongly impress upon the minds of all persons born in the first ten days of this month and of March, September, or December, of past years, the necessity for extreme caution in all matters pertaining to health and finance for several months to come; particularly should initiation of new ventures of magnitude be avoided for a time and the affairs of the life be conducted very conservatively rather than with venturesomeness or aggressiveness. The late evening hours are the best in the day for any extended mental efforts and for correspondence of consequence and they should be given the preference over any part of the day for such work.

2—Friday. Aside from the general injunction contained in the preceding paragraph this day is a fair one, especially for movements in matters pertaining to great corporations or with National, State, or municipal authorities, and persons claiming this as the anniversary of their birthday, if of suitable age at this time, are likely to be more or less concerned with public or corporate affairs at this period in their life, out of which a certain measure of benefit will be eventually derived though attended with many hindrances and delays; as matters in such lives generally in this year abound in disappointments and have tardy progress.

3—Saturday. One of the best days of the month. Urge business vigorously; particularly such as concerns houses and lands; deal in such commodities as coal, iron petroleum, wood, lumber, lead, wool and grain and, with discretion, in mining and railroad stocks provided thy nativity is favorable also in this respect at this time; make contracts for building and repairing; deal with persons engaged in fiduciary capacities; purchase goods for sale again in the forenoon, when also have thy dealings with persons of wealth or with banks or other monied concerns; experiment in chemistry, make engagements with machinists, manufacturers, and mechanics generally.

4—Sunday. Unfavorable for church matters; their pecuniary affairs are unsatisfactory for the day, or financial matters are adversely affected; the musical portion of religious worship will be most favored; the day is unfortunate in its tendencies in social matters and inclines to the pursuit of pleasure, which without unusual restraint will lead into dangerous walks; keep a healthful check upon excitable impulses.

5—Monday. Be up betimes and push thine efforts in nearly all affairs and matters of an intellectual and artistic character if now begun will be successful unless the nativity be very evilly afflicted; and even if such be the case, the time is probably as favorable as any that can be chosen in the passing days; press all engagements pertaining to literature and the fine arts, execute contracts concerning same; launch literary productions unless specifically advised otherwise in this column; engage with printers, publishers, travelers, teachers, and mathematicians and pursue all scientific researches; the afternoon and evening are fortunate for important moves with reference to music and the drama and also for social enjoyments, urging thy suit with the fair sex, and pleasure-seeking with moderation.

6—Tuesday. Bridle the tongue in the morning lest quarrels come; have no dealings with mechanics nor with builders; and generally conduct thine affairs with prudence and moderation, carefully avoiding hasty decisions and precipitate action; do not expect much favor from thy dealings with large corporate bodies, such as railroads, electrical companies, and City, State, or National authorities.

7—Wednesday. Urge general business during the day; prosecute mathematical and scientific studies; deal with the intellectual classes, booksellers, publishers, printers, judges, and lawyers; do not take the time, however, to change thy place of residence, nor for making any business engagement with persons handling patents or patented articles.

8—Thursday. Partial Eclipse of the sun. One of the most unfortunate days of the month. The forenoon particularly brings baffling experiences and is more likely to bring disappointment from the ventures then inaugurated; do not begin any journey in the morning hours and beware of incurring the displeasure of those in authority; the criminal classes will be unusually disturbed during the night hours between the 7th and 8th and unfortunately moved to malice and violence; the vital energies will be low in such hours and sudden collapse in all serious afflictions is to be carefully guarded against. These suggestions are peculiarly appropriate for persons born about the 12th of January, 11th of March, 29th of May, 8th of June, 13th of July, 12th of September, 30th of November, and 10th and 17th of December, of past years, and such persons will need to exercise more care than usual this year and near this time as well as near their birthday anniversaries, in all their business ventures and in matters of health; ladies so born, are likely to be now in the midst of sad or trying experiences in family, domestic, or heart affairs; with the late hours of the day begins much improved and more buoyant conditions, in which the vigorous prosecution of affars is contributed to.

9—Friday. This is a very favorable day, inviting business activity, travel, and pecuniary benefits from dealings with banks and wealthy persons; buy goods for trade; speculate, if thy nativity be fairly favorable; sign writings; urge literary and scientific pursuits and apply for favor and advancement in thy several stations.

10—Saturday. Conditions on this day are baffling and disappointing and matters of much moment are best deferred awhile; have no dealings with thy landlord nor with contractors, plumbers, miners, farmers, nor any engaged in the dirty or laborious occupations; the evening hours are rather more favorable and contribute enjoyment from the musical, artistic, dramatic, and social entertainments and engagements.

11—Sunday. The mind inclines toward the elegant in literature and imagination will be especially active, though church matters are not favored.

12—Monday. Keep thy tongue under due restraint during the better part of this day, nor be rash in decision in business engagements; quarrels and contentions are easy of birth and criminal activity and violence abound at this time; let all be careful in handling fire and explosives.

13—Tuesday. The inventive faculties are excited here to successful efforts; urge all commercial contracts and dealings with monied institutions; buy goods for trade and apply personally for favor from public officers, superiors in authority, and tradesmen; do not expect the usual pleasure from the drama or from the social or musical entertainment in the evening.

14—Wednesday. Give preference to the forenoon hours for the most important commercial or financial transactions, but have care as the noon is approached after which do not look for much consideration from employees of the government or of railways or other great corporations; neither should any dealings with usurers or very old or eccentric persons be had.

15—Thursday. This day is only indifferent in promises of good, and as the evening approaches it bids fair to be absolutely evil; let all be cautious during the latter hours of this day and the forenoon of the next for deceit and treachery are abroad; sign no deeds or notes nor enter into any contract of importance; such things are best postponed a little; do not engage help or begin journeys. In the coming 24 hours bankers and merchants will be wise to scrutinize signatures on money writings. Some bad forgery or swindling operations come to light; nervous diseases are aggravated and persons having charge of the insane should be watchful of their patients during these passing days, being on guard against malice and cunning likely to be displayed by them; the intellectual classes and the literary and educational interests have in the past week suffered unusual detriment and increased mortality and business embarrassments are likely at this time among the literati, especially apparent in the suggestions for the 8th instant.

16—Friday. As already pointed out, the forenoon of this day is evil and ought not to be taken for beginning anything of consequence; but as the noon is passed improve every moment in the pursuit of art, music, or any of the elegant avocations; deal in fancy goods and engage in works of decoration or adornment; have the social entertainment and seek pleasure from the fine arts in every direction; urge thy suit with the fair sex and pursue all the artistic lines in the literary field.

17—Saturday. Choose this day for urging all honorable business to the utmost; for buying goods for trade and for money transactions generally; the merchant, tradesman, commercial traveler, and all engaged in literary pursuits or having employment concerning books are peculiarly favored.

18—Sunday. The best Sabbath day of the month, being excellent for improvement of the mind, propitious for religious exercises, and fortunate in a pecuniary sense for church matters.

19—Monday. Urge business of all kinds especially during the forenoon, preference being given, however, to such as depend upon mental labor. The day is especially favorable for literary work and prosecution of mathematical and scientific studies.

20—Tuesday. One of the depressing days of the month, in which it will not be wise to make any beginnings of consequence, and in which only routine matters should have attention; beware of entering into any deal pertaining to real estate.

21—Wednesday. Be slow to anger during this day; beware of litigation and contention at this time and be very careful if compelled to be about machinery and in the use of firearms or fires. To the fair sex the influences are ominous and REGULUS warns them against treachery and deceit, especially in matters pertaining to matrimony. Some scandalous report or revelation in divorce proceedings is likely to come to the surface here. The female sex meet strange and unfortunate experiences and encounter mischievous conditions for health. Proprietors of theaters and places of amusement should beware of making engagements on this day and should likewise be on the alert against fire and violence of the elements in these passing days. Marriageable ladies born about the 21st of February, 25th of May, 27th of August, or 26th of November, of past years, had better postpone for a season their ventures upon the sea of matrimony, for the social engagement or married life now begun will be full of discord, disappointment, sorrow and unhappiness. Conditions also severely test the already existing marital and betrothal bonds of ladies so born and the greatest circumspection will be needed in all the affairs of their lives.

22—Thursday. Avoid thy landlord on this day nor have any dealings with contractors, miners, farmers, plumbers, plasterers, or builders. The day does not encourage making beginnings in any enterprise.

23—Friday. Total Eclipse of the Moon. The very early morning and forenoon hours are the best. Use the early part of the day for money transactions or negotiations with banks and dealings with the wealthy classes; seek no favor from persons in public positions in the forenoon, but as the noon is passed bend every energy to the prosecution of thine affairs. The afternoon is full of energy and enterprise and invites activity in all the walks of life but especially for machinists, engineers, mechanics, travelers, surgeons, electricians, military men, cutlers, and iron and brass workers; consult thy dentist and experiment in chemistry with caution.

24—Saturday. The morning is very unfavorable for most undertakings, prompting rest rather than exertion and urging unusual caution in all acts, the avoidance of disputes or controversies and as much as possible all danger of accidents or hurts; let the tongue be kept well under control; the night and morning influences contribute to combustion and explosion, so have unusual care. Some bad disaster of this nature is likely in the passing hours.

25—Sunday. Rest late and look not for much satisfaction from pulpit utterances or religious discourse during the forenoon; though the afternoon gives much improvement in this particular and is the best part of the day for mental effort and the interest of all in the ecclesiastical callings.

26—Monday. Begin this day with the sun and improve every available moment, particularly in the pursuit of art, music, and in all the elegant avocations; deal in fancy goods and engage in works of decoration or adornment, especially such as pertain to houses or land; make engagements with architects, horticulturalists, and civil engineers, and deal with real estate men, miners, farmers, and all the classes concerned in building public works.

27—Tuesday. Have transactions with banks and monied men in the forenoon hours, but put on the "caution cap" as the noon hour is passed. The last half of the day is full of excitement and contention and it will require a cool head and even temper to resist being drawn into unpleasant controversies or predicaments. Persons born about the 18th of February, 23rd of June, 21st of August, 25th of October, or 22nd of December of past years, are likely to be now in the midst of more prosperous conditions and have improved health, while some temporary pecuniary embarrassments or unusual demands upon the purse, and, in some cases, poorer conditions of health result to persons born about the 19th of January, 22nd of April, or 25th of July, of past years.

28—Wednesday. Make no engagements towards wedlock nor expect much success in the elegant pursuits or from dealings in dry goods or fancy or ornamental wares. REGULUS especially advises the fair not to let wealth tempt them to wed in these passing days, especially where there is much disparity of years between the contracting parties, for disappointment and unhappiness lurk in the background and are likely to fall to their lot, particularly if their birthday anniversaries fall upon the days indicated in the 8th paragraph.

29—Thursday. Be up before the sun and employ every moment of the day; literary labors are performed with more facility from the midnight until the noon of this day; the day should be chosen for dealings with persons in the government service or with persons in charge of large corporate interests; or concerned with patents or patented articles, or with chemists, druggists, electricians and manufacturing interests.

30—Friday. Choose this day for urging all honorable business to the utmost, for buying goods for trade and money transactions generally; give preference to the afternoon for affecting engagements of consequence pertaining to the artistic pursuits and to real estate and its improvements; also for dealings with farmers, contractors and builders, plumbers, ship-joiners, and in agricultural implements and products.

FREE HELP FOR WEAK MEN

"CALTHOS"

Prof. Laborde's Marvelous French Cure for Lost Manhood.

FIVE DAYS' TRIAL TREATMENT

Sent Absolutely Free by Sealed Mail To All Sufferers.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

The only preparation known to science which really cures Lost Manhood is "CALTHOS," the marvelous French remedy discovered by Prof. Jules Laborde. It is controlled in this country by The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, a concern which occupies a high and honorable place in the world of medicine. It is one of the largest and most responsible houses in Cincinnati, as anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

The Von Mohl Company invites all men suffering from Lost Manhood, Spermatorrhœa, Varicocele, Small Parts or Weakness of any nature in the Nerves or Sexual Organs, to send their names and receive a five days' treatment. This will prove the wonderful vitalizing powers of "CALTHOS." After using it five days the sufferers will find new vigor in their organs, new force in their muscles, new blood in their veins, new ambition, and rapid progress toward the buoyant feelings and sensations of younger days.

This liberal free offer is genuine. There is no swindling C. O. D. or Deposit Scheme connected with it. The five days' treatment is sent by sealed mail to all on request, wrapped in a plain package, and full printed instructions accompany the medicine, so that each patient becomes his own doctor and cures himself at home.

It doesn't make any difference what caused the weakness—whether bad habits in youth, or excess, or overwork, or business troubles. "CALTHOS" will effect a cure, no matter what big name the disease may be called by doctors.

The Von Mohl Company treats all correspondence in perfect confidence. Under no conditions will it make public the names of the thousands who have written testimonials telling of their restoration to robust manhood after other medicines and appliances have proved worthless. "CALTHOS" is regularly used in the French and German armies, and the soldiers in those countries have come to be perfect models of strength and vitality. Cures are effected at all ages from twenty to eighty years. There is no case (except where the stage of epilepsy or insanity has been reached) which it will not radically, quickly and permanently cure. Sexual weakness does not cure itself. It grows worse from week to week. Each day aggravates the mental and physical anguish.

Send today for the free five days' trial treatment. If it helps you, more of the medicine can be purchased. If it does not help, no harm is done and no money has been paid out. You can send your name in the full knowledge that it will be kept from all. The "CALTHOS" department of our business is strictly confidential. Address applications for trial treatment, etc., to

Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

Agnes Repplier is known and loved through her work by a large part of the reading public. Essays are still a popular form of reading to the thinking class of readers. Miss Repplier's fame has all been won in this line of work. Her views of life have a quaint original turn that is very individual. Her works include Books and Men, Point of View, Essays in Miniature, Essays in Idleness, In the Dozy Hours and Varia. Miss Repplier is a native of the Quaker city and her last work, which is a departure from her special line of work is called Philadelphia, the Place and the People. In this book, Miss Repplier shows a thorough sympathy and appreciation of the Quaker spirit. She says "They have had scant justice done them and I am glad to fight their battles." Miss Repplier's books show a very thorough acquaintance with literature. She is given to quoting, but always in a most happy manner. It seems strange that she was very slow in learning to read. At the age of eleven she was sent with her sister to a convent near Philadelphia. Miss Repplier is a convert to the Catholic religion and her first published work was in the "Catholic World." She will soon make a visit to Italy, and people to whom her essays give much delight will anticipate some sparkling work from her new experiences.

The late Princess Kaiulani, or Miss Cleghorn as she became when the United States annexed her island kingdom, had much of the joy and sorrow, the pomp and the vanity of life crowded into her brief twenty-two years of existence. Her father A. S. Cleghorn was an Englishman who married Princess Likelike a sister of Lilliokalani then reigning Queen of the Paradise of the Pacific. The Queen had no children and as the line of Hawaiian descent is on the maternal side the niece became heir apparent to the throne. She was educated in England and possessed most of the characteristics of a high-bred English girl. She saw her royal claims set aside and from a princess became an American citizen. Much interest was aroused in her romantic story, and her sudden illness and death was much regretted in America.

Thomas Nelson Page is a typical American writer,—typical because it is one phase of this country that he shows. The South has found in him one of the most happy interpreters of "Dixie" Land. Mr. Page is a Virginian and related to half the aristocratic families of the state. One of his paternal ancestors was an intimate friend of Jefferson and on the maternal side he is descended from a signer of the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Page was a Richmond lawyer with no thought of a literary life when he was shown a letter taken from the pocket of a dead Georgia volunteer. The letter was from the man's sweetheart and stated that she would marry him if he would come home. The dramatic pathos of the situation induced Page to weave the facts into a story that he called Marse Chan. Scribner's Monthly accepted the story and gave the young writer $80 for it, accompanying the cheque with a note requesting an article on the Yorktown campaign. Thomas Nelson Page was fairly launched on a successful career as a literary man. No one has more graphically portrayed the South. Among his best known books are: Our Little Confederates, Befo' de War, On Newfound River and Pastime Stories. Mr. Page was born at Oakland, Hanover County, Virginia, on April 25, 1853. He is a graduate of the school Jefferson founded—The University of Virginia.

Manuel Asprios the new Mexican ambassador to the United States is exceedingly well qualified for his position. He speaks English fluently and has a wide knowledge of books, men and affairs. He is a recognized authority on international law and has published many books upon the subject. One of these, "Rights and Duties of Foreigners" is widely known. He has been a Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Mexico. He was born at Pueblo on July 9, 1836. He began the study of law but when the French seized Mexico he took an active part in the war. He was prosecutor in the court that condemned the unfortunate Emperor Maximillian to death. He became connected with the Mexican department of foreign relations in 1867. In 1872 he visited Washington as agent for the Mixed Claim Commission and the following year he was appointed Consul at San Francisco. He has been a member of the Mexican senate and was Assistant Secretary of Foreign Affairs when he was appointed as ambassador. He succeeds the late Senor Romero who with his charming American wife was so long and favorably known in Washington.

Mrs. Alice Meynell's name is not widely known in the generally accepted meaning of the term. In the inner circle of the literary world she is ranked as the foremost woman essayist and critic of the world. She has published little but as one English critic says "It is in her shortness that her genius appears." Mrs. Meynell's first published work was in 1875. Alice Thompson was an unknown writer and the modest volume of poems attracted little attention. At the time it was published Miss Thompson was living in Italy where she was educated by her father. Her essay "A Remembrance" pays a touching tribute to England where she became a frequent contributor to the periodicals. One of these "Merry England" was edited by Mr. Wilfred Meynell. The editor and his contributor were married and their home in Kensington soon became a literary center. John Ruskin says that some of Mrs. Meynell's poems are the finest things he has seen or felt in modern verse. Rossetti knew her sonnet "Renouncement" by heart and said that it was one of the three finest sonnets ever written by a woman. Three short books: The Rhythm of Life, The Colors of Life, and The Children constitute all of Mrs. Meynell's published work. Her genius is of the subtile and refined quality that escapes the attention of the masses but commands the unqualified praise of the most severely critical. To be a writer for writers is the distinction that Alice Meynell has attained.

Donna Amelia of Portugal is said to be the most beautiful Queen in Europe. She is accomplished as she is beautiful. The Queen of Portugal is a daughter of the late Comte de Paris. By a strange coincidence she was born on September twenty-eighth the birthday of her husband Don Carlos. The Queen is two years younger than her husband. Donna Amelia has other distinctions besides queenship and beauty. She holds a much coveted medal for saving life. She rescued two children from drowning in the Tagus. The Queen is an expert and fearless swimmer. She spends much time at Cascaes which is the seaside resort of Portugal. Here she may be seen, swimming far out where few dare follow her. She is usually attended by a cutter manned by blue jackets. She rides in the same fearless manner. Her expeditions used to take her "cross country" through the hilly, rough land surrounding Lisbon. Her court followed reluctantly but etiquette demanded that they attend where the Queen led. Donna Amelia is an earnest student, interested in deep theological questions and in medicine. She has passed the examinations in medicine before the faculty at Lisbon. She once attended a woodcutter who had received an injury. He deplored the fact that he could not pay his doctor but promised to bring some butter and eggs if she would leave her address. When he found that his physician was his Queen the house of Braganza gained one more faithful adherent.

E. T. Hooley, once millionaire, now is one of the most dramatic figures in the world of finance. His downfall stirred English society to its depths. Half the nobility of England trembled over the disclosures Hooley made. He calmly told of the thousands spent by him in bribing prominent men to give the use of their names as directors in the many schemes by which he made his millions. Hooley is not yet forty years of age. In an interview in the height of his prosperity he declared that he was never worried over any of the vast financial schemes that he was then undertaking. He succeeded by use of his wealth and his force of character in compelling some social recognition in England. He was a "promoter" and all of his schemes seemed to yield showers of gold until the crash came. He presented a gold service to St. Paul's; he proposed to devote the income of two million dollars to charity as a means of celebrating the Queen's Jubilee. At that time he declared that his only bother was how to spend his money properly. In his plan for charity he had fully outlined an old age pension scheme that had many admirable and practical features. Hooley left school when he was thirteen and while he attended school was obliged to walk eight miles a day. During the time that he was recognized as the Prince of Promoters, he worked from eight in the morning until ten at night and kept three secretaries constantly busy. He claimed to be the biggest sheep breeder in England. Farming was his hobby although he aspired to a seat in Parliament. He made money through the confidence which he inspired in people rather than through any real financial ability. He has a fertile and ingenious mind and it is doubtful if even his reverses will prevent him from coming again to the front.

Edwin Pugh is a young writer—young both in years and fame. He has grasped recognition in the face of very adverse circumstances. When but a child his father died and he as the eldest of a large family became the bread-winner. For fourteen hours a day he worked in an iron foundry but under these conditions and when but twelve years of age he sold his first story. He found a sale also for all the stories, poems and articles that he found time to write. At last he was able to feel that his pen could become his means of livelihood. The Man of Strow, King Circumstance and Tony Drum made his name known to the readers of England and America. His last book in which he collaborated with Mr. Charles Gleig is called The Rogues' Paradise. Mr. Pugh can feel that he has conquered fate in his struggle for recognition.

A JUNE DAY.

And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays;
Whether we look or whether we listen,
We hear life murmur, or see it glisten;
Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And, groping blindly above it for light,
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers;
The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back over hills and valleys;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice;
And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace;
The little bird sits at his door in the sun,
Atilt like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illumined being o'errun
With the deluge of summer it receives;
His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,
And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings;
He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest—
In the nice ear of Nature, which song is the best?

THE TENDERFOOT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY SAM P. DAVIS.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher

IT WAS plain to the most casual observer that the gentleman who arrived at the Western Hotel, Tombstone, Arizona, was a tenderfoot. His air, his walk and his attire all proclaimed the manner of the man.

The loungers about the bar room sized him up as he registered his name and each of these keen observers of character mentally reached the conclusion that he was just the sort of a man that somebody was certain to have some fun with before night.

There was indeed much in his makeup which was calculated to give offence to the more settled population of Tombstone. He wore clothes of a fashionable cut, flaunted tidy shoes in the face of the community and offered no apologies for a shirt as outrageously clean as had ever reared its affronting presence in the town.

"He'll be wearing a plug hat by to-morrow," was the observation of Lumpy Jaw Pete, who was getting nervous as he contemplated the stranger's exasperating bearing, and when the latter had asked to be shown his room without inviting the gathering to treat, it was clear to everybody that here was a case in which it was fairly becoming to the better element to assert the dignity and traditions of Tombstone.

"When he comes downstairs agin," said Pete, "I'll see that he does some dancin' for the amoosement of the crowd."

The crowd, in anticipation of this amusement, remained to see the sort of Terpsichorean exercise the stranger might be induced to favor them with, under the stimulus of Pete's persuasive six shooter. The fact that Pete contemplated amusing himself with the new arrival soon advertised itself and there was a general movement toward the Western Hotel.

"I suppose the fellar's a washin' up," remarked Pete, anxious to frame some reasonable excuse for the familiarity he was about to indulge in with the eastern gentleman.

As he spoke the stranger once more stepped into the room and, without noticing the crowd drew a chair to the stove, and taking a cigar case from his pocket drew forth a weed, and before the crowd could recover, produced a silver match case. Slipping a match from the case he was about to bite the end of the cigar when there came the sharp crack of Pete's pistol.

The match, held an instant in view between Pete and the stove, was too tempting a mark to overlook and he had essayed to demolish it with his bullet, but just as he had touched the trigger it had been lowered a trifle and the shot, grazing the brimstone, ignited it. The ball flattened itself against the stove. As the match flamed up the stranger, without looking round, held the cigar in the place so lately occupied by the match and remarked:

"Thanks awfully. Please take another shot at the tip of this cigar and then have a smoke with me."

It would hardly be the thing to refuse a banter like that and Pete removed the tip of the weed with a second bullet; then it seemed to dawn upon him that he was not exactly having any very considerable amount of fun with the stranger. The man lit his cigar with the match that Pete had so unwittingly ignited and Pete concluded it was time to assert himself or forever acknowledge that he had been downed by a tenderfoot who might for all he knew hail from as far back east as Boston.

"What might your business be stranger?" he inquired, holding the gun toward him in a grossly familiar way.

"It might be yours, but possibly it isn't," was the reply as the man from the east continued filling the air with smoke.

It was now clear to Pete that he had received provocation sufficient to excuse him if he opened actual hostilities.

"Do you ever dance?"

"In my younger days I was considered a fair waltzer but late years I have regarded the accomplishment as one of the ridiculous follies of my youth."

"Wal, stranger, I've concluded to invite you to renew the follies of your younger days and if yer don't git out on the sawdust here and give the company a jig I'll begin a blowin' of yer feet off. So hop in now and make the deal lively and get to work quick."

"So you say the penalty of non-compliance with your request will be the loss of both feet."

"You've got it sized up about right and I'm glad to see that you catch on without too much explaining my game. Now you understand the prop, git up and perform."

The Easterner's left leg was thrown carelessly across his knee and his foot was between Pete and the stove, an easy mark as every one could see, with the stove in the background to take the bullet.

"Would you like to wager something on your marksmanship?" he said, quietly, as he took a wallet from his pocket.

Pete glanced at the wallet and shifted his hand toward his weapon which for a few moments had been back in his belt.

"I will lay a hundred even that you cannot make me move my foot from the place where it now is. A hundred a shot and for each shot you have left. You have four remaining shots and that makes four hundred dollars and the distance is but about eight feet I should say. Come my good man don't hesitate, you certainly ought not to miss a mark like that. It seems to me like picking money up. If you lose I will then take some shots at your feet on the same terms, but of course I want my turn—after you of course—that is, if you lose I will give you a chance to get your money back. But if you win and possibly you may, then I will not ask for a return match. They do say that I am a dead game sport where I live and if I lose my money no one ever hears a whimper after that. Here, let the landlord hold the stakes," and as he spoke he shoved $400 in crisp bills into the landlord's hands.

"It do for shore look like a fair prop, Pete," said Borax Bill. "He don't git nary a shot at you unless yer miss. It looks to me like gittin' into the Tombstone Bank safe and the cashier drunk."

"I'll see yer four hundred and raise it to a thousand," said Pete, drawing out his wallet.

The stranger immediately produced another roll of bills and said carelessly:

"Would you mind going a little higher?"

Pete had gone to the foot of his wallet and couldn't "come again." It chagrined him to realize that he was unable to meet the raise of a tenderfoot but he had to stand it.

"Possibly some other of you gentlemen would like to realize a little money on this transaction," continued the tenderfoot as he waved a handful of bills about the circle.

"Is the bet that Pete can't make you take your foot down in four shots?"

"That is my understanding of it, sir."

In an instant several wallets were in evidence and it did not take long to get a couple of thousand dollars more up as stakes. It was promptly covered by the imperturbable tenderfoot and when there was no more money forthcoming he poised his foot in front of the stove and asked Pete if he was ready.

Pete responded to the query by lifting his weapon, and faster than one could count the shots he sent four bullets crashing through the stranger's foot. The latter merely puffed his cigar and the foot never so much as moved an inch.

There was a silence over all the crowd as the man sat there with his foot rent by the bullets, but his nerve never weakened and there was no change of countenance to tell of the horrible pain that must have racked him.

"Gentlemen, do I win or lose?"

"You win," came from all in one breath, and at this the landlord handed the money over.

"I believe it is my turn now," said the stranger, rising and covering Pete's foot with a six-shooter. The latter turned pale and edged away.

"You can't shirk it, Pete," came from several at once, and they laid hands on him and forced him to face the stranger. "You lamed a boy here years ago and this 'll even it up."

"That boy was my son," continued the tenderfoot, and a moment later he sent a bullet through Pete's instep and the man was dragged away howling with agony.

"Do you need any doctor for your foot?" they asked as they crowded about the man who now had $3000 of Tombstone money safe in his wallet.

"It's hardly the kind of a foot that needs an M. D. I'll fix up a new one when I get upstairs. I always carry a couple of extra ones when I travel in the West. If you need any legs or feet while I am in Tombstone give me a call."

The tenderfoot laid down his card and skipped lightly upstairs. It read:

Artificial Limbs and Feet. Vulcanized Rubber Feet a Specialty. Have worn one for four years. Call and see it. SILAS SKINNER, Boston, Mass.

It was many moons before Lumpy Jaw Pete again proposed to make fun for the crowd at the expense of a so-called "tenderfoot."

A TREATMENT FOR COLOR.

Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the Leopard his spots?—Jeremiah.

CAMDEN Heard added M. D. to his name—at his father's expense—and a prodigal growth of unkempt beard to his face. After graduation, and a year of hospital work, he returned to his native town, put out his sign, and inquired concernedly as to the state of the public health. His old friends and neighbors listened with commendable patience while he expounded unto them anatomy from parietal to hullux; but, though he charged madly through the street at all hours of the day and night, medicine-chest in hand, no one was ever inspired with any confidence in his ability to successfully combat the various ills that assail the flesh. They had known him as a boy; and a prophet—or other professional man—is not without honor save in his own country.

It took some time for the true situation to dawn upon Heard. But he came to realize that he was playing a losing game, for Fate threw loaded dice. Pride prevented an immediate surrender, but at the expiration of one year he went South for his health.

Attracted by a sweeping reduction in rates, Heard joined a "home-seekers" excursion that had Georgia as its ultimate destination. The particular spot to which they journeyed was canon-typed as the land flowing with milk and honey, where man could fare sumptuously every day on Nature's bounty, leaving the morrow to care for itself.

One evening, in company with ten land-boomers and three victimized investors, Dr. Camden Heard stepped from the train at La Grange. It was a step that he regretted at once, and many times thereafter. The sudden transition from the rush and roar of the rail to the complete coma of La Grange was depressing. He remarked something to this effect.

"It's not dead," one of the boomers hastened to assure him. "Not dead but sleeping. Wait till we get the two peach-canneries, and the cotton-spinners, and the creamery, and the cotton-seed oil factories, and—just wait."

From force of circumstances Heard was compelled to wait. Fortunately for him, two of the victimized investors had cramp colic the day following their arrival—due, perhaps, to the richness of the milk and honey. This gave the new doctor an opportunity to demonstrate his ability.

It is needless to enumerate the various patients—mostly blacks—that sought the aid of Dr. Heard while he was endeavoring to make himself a fixture in the place. He was able to live without calling for any paternal assistance, and that was something to be thankful for, notwithstanding the fact that the arrogant whites resented his presence as an intrusion.

After one of his busiest days, Heard was about to close up his office when a tall, good-featured negro entered.

"Well, Collat," said the doctor, "what can I do for you? I'm bound to say you don't look like a man in need of quinine or calomel."

"I am not, sir," the negro answered. "I doubt if you have any drugs that will help my case."

"Let's hear the worst," said the doctor, encouragingly. "I'll guarantee to help you."

For a moment the negro's face lighted with hope.

"You know something of my situation," he said.

"Yes," Heard replied lightly; "you are the richest colored man in the South; you drive the fastest horses in Georgia; you have education, refinement—all the advantages that anyone could ask for."

"What you say is true," Collat answered. "God has seen fit to bless and prosper me far beyond anything that I deserve; but He has withheld the one thing that I most desire. Doctor, my life is a living hell. Better never to have been born, than to have been born a black! Perhaps brooding over the matter has unsettled my mind—I do not know; but I have dreamed that you could help me, and I still cling to the superstitious beliefs of my race—it is a part of me. Tell me this, sir, is there anything in the world that will make me white—if only for a day? Everything that I possess shall be yours if you can accomplish it."

The negro had worked himself up into a kind of frenzy, and he paced the office with clinched hands and heaving chest. Heard felt inclined to laugh, but seeing the condition of the man, he deemed it wise to humor him.

"I'm sure, Collat," he replied, "I never learned of any treatment that would make black white. However, I will give the subject some thought, and perhaps we might try some experiments. Come back in a week."

From considering the matter in the light of a joke, Heard came to the point of earnest investigation. He made a thorough study of every bleaching agent known to science. And then, not satisfied with his own researches, he consulted a score of eminent chemists, withholding from them, of course, the real object that he wished to accomplish. The greatest obstacle in the way of success was the tenderness of the human skin. It seemed impossible to obtain satisfactory results without burning and blistering the entire surface of the body.

When about to give up the undertaking, Heard received something like an inspiration. He remembered that at college the negro subjects for dissection, when kept for any time in the brine tank, turned a grayish white. If the bath could be made to work more rapidly on a living subject, the problem would be solved.

While these investigations were going on, Collat had never let a day pass without seeing the doctor. And when Heard at last announced that there was a reasonable hope of success, the negro was almost wild with joy.

"Well, Collat," Heard said one evening, "I think the time has about come to give it a trial. Are you ready for it?"

The negro's agitation was so great that he could not form the words of a reply, but he followed the doctor to the bathroom and gazed with rolling eyes at the milky solution in the tub. Under Heard's direction he removed his clothing, placed two little rubber plugs and tubes in his nostrils, then submerged himself in the liquid.

Thirty minutes later the doctor rapped on the side of the tub and Collat sprang out. Scarcely had his feet touched the floor when he screamed with pain and clapped his hand over his eyes.

"Why don't you speak?" he cried. "Tell me man, am I white? This stuff has gotten into my eyes and I can't see. I'll kill you if I'm still a black!"

"You're still a nigger," Heard replied with a sneer, "but your skin is whiter than mine."

"Thank God!" Collat shouted, sinking down on his knees and beating his breast. "Thank God!"

"Better thank me," said the doctor. "The Almighty made you a negro. I made you white. Now, Collat," he continned in a business-like tone, "let's have a clear understanding about this transaction. You offered me everything you possessed if I could accomplish this change. That was a little effusive. What do you propose paying me?"

But Collat was in no condition of mind to talk rationally. It was all Heard could do to get him dressed and started on his way home.

For a period of six months Collat was lost sight of—not the black one alone, but likewise the white one. At the end of that time he returned, all white but the backs of his hands. Heard refused to have anything to do with him.

"I never allow the same man to make a fool of me twice," the doctor told him.

"But I'm turning black again," Collat pleaded.

"You'll stay that way, as far as I'm concerned," Heard replied. "The first treatment has proved a whitewash all around."

"I forgot what a debt of gratitude I owed you," persisted Collat. "I was so overjoyed that my brain was turned. If you will just treat me now I will double the amount of your charge."

"Twice nothing," murmured the doctor.

A few days later Collat returned with a small hand-bag. It contained about ten thousand dollars in bills.

"It's all the cash I could raise on short notice," he said. "I want you to take it all and make me white once more. See here!—there are great brown patches all over my neck and arms."

Heard refused the money and ordered the unfortunate man away from his office.

"I really don't think it's safe to have a nigger masquerading under a white man's skin," he said. "There's too much animal in them."

"Have you no pity or compassion?" pleaded Collat. "Merciful Heaven, man! I have married a white wife. Only think of my situation!"

Heard laughed until the tears stood in his eyes. "That's the nigger of it," he observed.

"Then," cried Collat, "if you won't help me, I'll mix up the brine bath myself."

"You are a fool," Heard retorted. "Do you suppose that it took nothing but salt to work that metamorphosis?"

Collat slunk away with sullen threats of revenge.

"Revenge," mused the doctor, "what revenge could equal mine! At any rate I have done the right thing by the white woman he deceived."

Meanwhile the woman in question had been visiting friends in La Grange. Heard of course failed to connect Mrs. Jean Attro with the wife of Collat. One evening as Mrs. Attro was passing along a dark street, a burly negro caught her in his arms and kissed her.

"Vara!" he cried, "you must not be afraid of me. I'm turning black.—Don't you know me—my voice?—I'm Jean. For God's sake don't send me away!—I love you so."

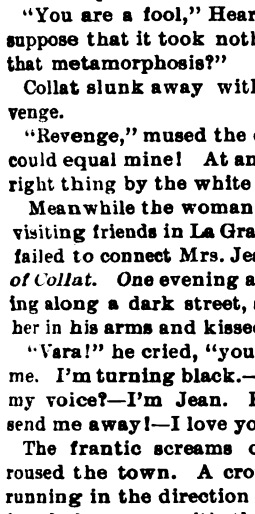
The frantic screams of a woman quickly roused the town. A crowd of men were soon running in the direction of the outcry. They found the negro with the woman still clasped in his arms.

"She's mine, I tell you!" the negro cried.

Then he was grappled from behind and violently thrown to the ground.

"Collat!—it's Collat!" the crowd shouted.

"Keep quiet, boys," said the man who was holding Collat down by the throat. "Take the woman away and we'll soon do for this black brute."



Toward morning the crowd pushed out over the low red hills and far into the country. In their midst Collat struggled wildly. His prayers and curses could be heard long after the men had disappeared through the first fringe of pines. The next day the papers of the country chronicled another lynching in Georgia.

It is said that Dr. Camden Heard did everything in his power to save the life of the negro. He even went so far as to claim that Collat really was the husband of Mrs. Attro. That is why he had to leave the State on short notice.

AUNT DEBBY'S WHALE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY BRADLEY GILMAN.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

COMPETITION for boarders was very close, that summer, at Brant Bay. The Hotel at the Point, was of course always full; its "orchestra," (a flute cornet and piano) lifted it to the level of easy superiority; but among the boarding-houses, competition was intense and open. When the "Smith Cottage" bought a new croquet-set, the "Jones Villa" added some large red armchairs to its piazza; when the "Mariner's Rest" put on a free carriage to and from the railway station the "Bellevue Inn" erected two new bath-houses, "for guests only." At the "Sunset Pavilion," where Aunt Debby presided, the attractions were the "home cooking," and a "boiling spring," behind the house, said (by Aunt Debby), to contain minerals of great curative power.

In addition to these attractive features, Aunt Debby's husband, "Captain L'ander," might be mentioned; he had some local fame, among the young people, as a skilled fisherman; and, among their mammas—as a cautious skipper. You could always find Captain L'ander, when he was not away on his boat, by following the house until you came to the shed; there in the doorway he commonly sat, his long, lank form doubled up on a three-legged stool, a huge brown calico apron tied about his waist, a corn-cob pipe in mouth, and a pan of peas, or some potatoes, in his lap. There the casual visitor might be allowed to see him, but briefly, and for business purposes only. Five minutes was considered by vigilant Aunt Debby long enough to arrange about tide, bait, and the price of the Captain's cat-boat; if you lingered beyond this limit, her small wiry form appeared at the kitchen door, and her shrill voice summoned the Captain to feed the chickens, or split some firewood, or run to the store on an "errant."

Aunt Debby did not spare herself, any more than her meek, patient husband. She cooked, and made beds, and "did all her own work." The Captain had rarely appeared inside the house since that unhappy morning when he walked absent-mindedly into the front room, among the boarders, barefooted, and with "gallusers" dangling at his heels. Thenceforth he occupied the shed, and had a bunk in the loft.

Despite her hardworking sixty years, Aunt Debby's alert eyes and ears kept her informed upon all the affairs of the Bay. She knew how many rooms remained empty in every house, why the family from Philadelphia had left the Seaside Inn, what price the rich patent-medicine proprietor paid at the "Wanderer's Retreat," and how to work over the roast of one day into a delicious stew for the day following.

Competition, however, was close, and although the "Sunset Pavilion" had its fair share of patronage, Aunt Debby strained every nerve, in order, as she plaintively put it—"to make both ends meet."

Competition never had been so severe as this summer; but Aunt Debby was devout, and, in her way, trusted in Providence, next to trusting in her own vigorous self; so that when a whale washed ashore, one stormy night, close by the bridge near the Pavilion, she felt that it had been providentially sent to her very door, as a counter-attraction to the Bowling Alley recently erected at the Mariner's Rest, just across the Bay.

There was great excitement over the huge dead monster. Aunt Debby's prescient eye instantly saw in it a rare means of income. She presently directed the "Capt'n" to make it fast by a hawser to one of the piers of the bridge; then she dispatched him to the village for a carpenter and lumber; and, by high-noon of that day, the leviathan was surrounded by a board-fence, and the captain was seated at the entrance, taking fifteen cents from every curious person who "wanted to see the whale."

Of course everybody came to gaze at the novel sight; boarders from all the other houses, school-children and parents from the neighboring towns, and even opulent guests from the hotel at the Point, asking, carelessly, to have ten—and even twenty-dollar bills changed; (and, after the first few hours, Capt'n L'ander could easily change them.)

Aunt Debby's pulse beat rapidly, but, outwardly she gave no sign of excitement; her thin, nervous lips twitched slightly, and she rattled the dishes in the kitchen a bit more than usual; few persons could have detected the high exultation of ownership which filled her soul; yet, underneath all, the good woman's fundamental principles and sympathies remained unbroken; for, when one of the shiftless families from the village came over, hoping to catch some glimpse of the now famous monster, Aunt Debby let them all go in, father, mother, eight children and two dogs, without charge.

The Captain's pockets bulged out with copper and silver coins; and, for his part, he would have been satisfied to "let well enough alone:" but when Aunt Debby saw the exciting "story" of the whale, in the local newspaper, and took note of the eager crowd coming from the railroad station, she went through some violent internal commotion, and ordered the Capt'n to climb up to the sprawling sign over the entrance, "Admission 15 cents," and change the figure "1" to "2."

Not the least part of Aunt Debby's joy was in her turgid sense of victory; she loved money, but she loved success and power more; yet even in this very flush of her towering supremacy over her rivals, her warm heart asserted itself, and she sent word to every proprietor around the Bay to come and see the whale on her invitation, without charge.

Two days passed, and the crowds grew more dense. Three days passed, three hot August days, and the crowd was just as large, the eagerness to enter was quite as great, but—people came out rather hurriedly, and with a certain peculiar appearance of relief. That evening, Capt'n L'ander's brown, wrinkled face wore a troubled expression. He cautiously beckoned his wiry, bespectacled little helpmeet out to the shed, carefully closed the door, and confided to her his fears that "the critter was a-sp'ilin'."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Aunt Debby. "No sich thing!" And she marched straight out through the darkness, to the enclosure, sniffed and sniffed again, and could smell nothing; not she.

Capt'n L'ander had followed her, with a dejected air; and when his energetic wife exclaimed, with conviction, that she could not detect the slightest smell, he meekly assented, and stammered that he "guessed that he was mistaken."

The next day the rays of the sun poured down as fervidly as ever; and, although the Captain tried his best to ignore the fact, the universal testimony of the crowd of plain-speaking visitors corroborated the testimony of his own nose, and he was silent and thoughtful.

Late in the afternoon Aunt Debby came out, and inspected her prize. She apparently took no notice of the protective actions of the people about her, and the Captain said nothing. That evening, however, she ordered her husband to "dress the whale;" and the "dressing" process was carried out; with knife and spade and hoe the offending viscera of the whale were removed, and were carried away by wheelbarrow loads, and dumped at low water mark on the marsh.

Another morning dawned, and the crowds still flocked to see the monster; receipts were large, but the Captain seemed more and more depressed. Aunt Debby, however, carried an air of resolute cheerfulness, and her husband held no conversation with her. She clattered the dishes more than ever, and none of her boarders seemed inclined to mention the whale in her presence. Among themselves, and even with the Captain, they talked freely of the objectionable odor which was daily growing stronger, and was causing much sharp comment among the other boarding-houses. That afternoon the attendance decreased greatly. The few people who went inside the enclosure, came out with hands over noses, with much coughing and with very wry faces.

During the afternoon Aunt Debby went up to town, and returned with several bulky packages. Early the next morning, she and the Captain were seen to be busily engaged in mixing various liquids in a barrel and some pails; and a strong odor of cheap perfume permeated the neighborhood, and struggled hopelessly with the odor of the defunct leviathan. Captain Leander was seen to go into the enclosure, with a garden-pump, and pail after pail of a lemon-colored fluid. When the earliest spectators arrived they discovered the Captain spraying the great creature, as if it had been a plumtree or a grapevine; and the powerful odor of perfume and decaying tissue was penetrating, but unpleasant, in the extreme.

The local newspaper, that day, contained several playful allusions to the "new guest," at the Bay; and, in an obscure corner of the editorial page, could be read an enigmatic paragraph, a brief leader, on "the strength of whales," as compared with other animals. Aunt Debby rarely wasted time on newspapers; but Captain L'ander read it all, and grew more depressed.

That noon, after dinner, the boarders at the "Pavilion," Aunt Debby's house—held a secret indignation meeting; and three of them gave notice that they were going away the next morning. Through it all, scowls, sniffs, laughter, and ill-concealed jokes, Aunt Debby's utter ignorance of her boarders' and neighbors' feelings was remarkable. Her piercing gray eyes seemed to see nothing wrong; and that sharp thin nose, so keen to detect odors of burning in the kitchen, was strangely dull to the rank, oppressive odor, which brooded over all the neighborhood like a malignant mist.

Aunt Debby always clung tenaciously to an idea, when once she had given it hospitality; up to the present moment her idea, her conviction, her determined will was—that the whale was wholly unobjectionable and harmless. But when the Board of Health appeared, as they did, that evening, she could no longer refuse to recognize the ugly facts in the case. She sat stiffly on the edge of her chair, as they timidly and awkwardly made known to her, that the case was a desperate one and must be met promptly with some sort of remedy. What that remedy should be, they did not suggest; but they intimated that the whale was hers and that she must dispose of it at once, or the law against public nuisances would be enforced.

The whale certainly was hers; hers and the Captain's; he was their property; the whole of him; his body indeed, was on their land only; but his presence was felt, or sensed, so to speak, along the entire shore. They must certainly do something to quiet the popular indignation.

Anybody except Aunt Debby would have given over the struggle at once, and sought means of disposing of the objectionable monster; but that energetic person asked tartly for a delay of twenty-four hours in the proceedings of the Board; and it was with great reluctance granted her.

She at once gathered materials, and promptly set about "pickling" the creature as she had many a time successfully pickled pork and beef; she prepared barrels of strong salt brine; and Captain Leander—much suffering martyr—was ordered to cut openings in the creature and fill him with the preserving fluid.

In vain, in vain! Nature could not be baulked, even by the resolute little woman in spectacles; and the nauseous odor, which permeated the neighborhood, became so heavy and oppressive that even Aunt Debby herself admitted—to her husband only—"that the critter did smell ruther strong."

Matters were growing more and more desperate. It was generally believed that the Captain and his wife were about at their wit's end. Their boarders had all departed, except one infirm old lady whose sight and hearing—and, presumably her sense of smell—were much impaired, and a college boy, who had exceeded his allowance, and had no money to settle his bill and buy a railroad ticket. The Captain's air of depression had increased to an anxious and almost alarming degree; but his wife's under jaw gripped her upper one more firmly than ever, as she grimly tried one expedient after another, to rid herself of her obnoxious property.

The fame of the whale had now spread far and wide. Boston newspapers referred to it sarcastically, and letters of inquiry and suggestion came to the Pavilion, in every mail.

The Board of Health met twice, and discussed the matter thoroughly; but while they agreed as to the flagrancy of the nuisance, they could offer no definite advice as to its abatement.

Captain Leander began to receive insulting, threatening letters; and he was now so despondent and distracted that he stayed close in the house; or, rather in the shed. Aunt Debby several times counted over the money received from admissions—one hundred and eighty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents—and grimly balanced it against the loss of boarders.

Finally Captain Leander broke down. The over-worked and much harrassed man walked despairingly into the front parlor, sat himself down in the best new rocking-chair and silently wept.

The sight of her husband's break-down moved Aunt Debby more than could the anger of her neighbors, or the threats of the Board of Health. She was deeply stirred, but even now her stern, repressed Puritan nature found no vent in useless weeping and lamentation. Instead, she projected a bold plan of escape; she remembered a married niece in the West, and she summoned her demoralized husband to assist her, at once, in packing up, announcing to him definitely that they would leave the Bay by the early morning train, while yet the town was asleep, and would accept the oft-repeated invitation to visit this niece.

This avenue of escape encouraged poor Captain Leander considerably, and the two worked with hopeful determination far into the night, packing trunks with their valuables and nailing up boxes to leave behind them.

No chance visitor or caller happened in to disturb their plan. Indeed, the whale was a sufficient guard against such intrusion; besides, a heavy storm was brewing. By midnight, when the two exhausted old people threw themselves down for a brief rest, the rain was beating fiercely against the house and the wind was blowing heavily from the southwest.

Early the next morning they arose and dressed themselves. The Captain moved about mechanically, as if in a dreadful dream. He obeyed Aunt Debby as though he had been a child. The excitement and anxiety of the past few days had been almost more than he could bear. His eyes were red and moist, and he passed his coat-sleeve over them frequently. As for Aunt Debby, she maintained a stoical demeanor, but her voice had a tenderer note in it, as she gave orders to the Captain, than he had observed for many a year. It was a dreadful revolution for them both, and only necessity could have driven them to it. However, it seemed to them both the only course open, to flee from the public wrath and leave the Board of Health to do as they pleased with the whale, and then to return, after the summer was over and the boarders gone.

A pitiable pair of aged fugitives they were as they issued stealthily from the rear door, in the gray dawn, and the Captain piled up the hand-cart with trunks and bundles. Presently all was ready; Aunt Debby locked the door and put the key defiantly into her pocket, and the two started for the station.

The rain had ceased and the wind had shifted to the northwest. As they came out into the road, the Captain glanced, from force of habit, over toward the bridge and toward the whale.

The handle of the cart dropped from his nerveless fingers, and two trunks rolled out upon the ground. But the Captain heeded them not. He stood speechless, at first with wonder and then with delight, as he gradually mastered the plain fact that the whale, that huge laboratory of evil odors, that immovable, indestructible monster which had defied all his efforts, well,—it was gone!

"Gone! It's gone!" he exclaimed, in hoarse delight; and excitedly tried to embrace Aunt Debby then and there.

That excellent woman repulsed him with severity; then she showed an amount of emotion greater than at any time for thirty years. As she pushed her excited husband away her hand lingered a moment on his shoulder, almost with a caress, and she ejaculated:

"Wal, you pore tired critter! You're kinder shook up. Now let's go back into the house."

Back they went. They had seen at once how the high wind and a full-moon tide had combined to lift the body of the whale from its resting-place, and the shifting wind had blown it far out upon the bay, far from the sight of human eyes, far from the scent of human nostrils.

One reference, and one only, Aunt Debby made to the whale, as they hurriedly unpacked trunks and boxes.

"L'ander," she observed, reflectively, "I'm sorry you left them sticks of dynamite inside of him. It's such a waste!"

THE HAND ON THE PANE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY W. BERT FOSTER.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

LEANED forward and closely examined the window pane behind Jennison's chair. Something on the glass had attracted my wandering attention as I sat there idly drumming upon the chair arms and waiting for Jennison to return. It was the print of a hand—a small, slender hand—upon the otherwise clear window pane. It looked as though the warm flesh had but just been removed from contact with it. I passed my hand over the mark. It was not ground into the glass, for I could feel no roughness; yet it was indelible.

Jennison, coming back to his private office just then, saw what I was about. He uttered a little exclamation and quickly fitting a thin board over the pane, snapped the spring which held it in place. Evidently the pane, which was directly behind the chair in which he usually sat, was seldom uncovered.

I glanced up interrogatively. His usually ruddy, jolly face had lost its color and was preternaturally grave. I was too much astonished to allow the incident to pass without comment.

"What is it, Jennison?" I asked.

"Nothing—it's nothing at all," he said, hastily.

"Nonsense! What is that mark?"

"The mark?" he repeated, vaguely.

"Yes, on the window pane? Who did it and how was it done?"

"So—so you see it, too, do you?" he asked, hesitatingly.

"I see it, too!" I repeated, in amazement. "Why shouldn't I? Think I'm blind?"

"No, that's not it," he returned, slowly. "But it's—well, it's of no consequence, it really isn't."

"Come, old man," I said. "Out with it. What's the mystery?"

He wet his lips (and I'm hanged if they weren't pale) before replying.

"Why are you so sure there is a mystery?" he demanded. Then he added hastily: "I—I—well, of course, my boy, there is something strange about it. You say you saw a mark on the glass. What was it?"

"Ah, now you are getting down to facts," I said. "I saw the imprint of a hand—a woman's hand, I should say."

"So you did see it?" he repeated. "Yes, it's a woman's hand."

"Who put it there? Surely it isn't a chance imperfection in the glass. It is a perfect impression (or so I thought) of a very beautiful hand."

"Rogers," he said, slowly, "I had much rather not tell you. But if you insist—. Do you remember the Sterlings, of Worcester?"

"Colonel Abram Sterling? yes, I remember him," said I. "Let's see, wasn't his wife a Mason—daughter or niece of Judge Ellery Mason?"

"Niece. But she died twenty odd years ago—just after her daughter was born. The old colonel himself has been in his grave a decade."

"What became of the children—there was a boy and a girl, wasn't there? But pardon me for interrupting——"

"That's all right," said Jennison. "It's about the children I have to tell. They were left parentless, as I say, more than ten years ago. The colonel had watched over them as tenderly as a mother and they were indeed desolate. It was the worse for the boy, for he was a wild, harum-scarum lad of fourteen. The girl was eleven and one of the sweetest characters I ever met."

"If she was like her mother," said I, "she could be nothing else."

"True. And she was like her. The same kind of a spirituelle creature. I had the honor of being the colonel's legal adviser and saw a good deal of the children both before and after his death. The property was left in my care also, while Merritt and Louise were growing up. It had been better, perhaps, had the property continued in my guardianship, for as soon as Merritt obtained control of his he began to make ducks and drakes of it. The Lord only knows where the fellow got such vicious traits: it hasn't shown out in either the Sterlings or Masons for half a dozen generations. He was the black sheep of the family.

"Louise shielded him in his boyhood when he got into scrapes and she continued to have faith in him, as they grew older. You perhaps remember the Thorndykes, who lived next to the old colonel's? Yes? well, while they were children Louise had a willing assistant in her watchcare of Merritt in Tom Thorndyke—as manly a lad as ever stepped, Rogers. Tom and Louise were sweethearts almost from their cradles, and both the Colonel and Tom's parents hoped to see the young people's liking for each other ripen into something more serious in time.

"And it did. The Thorndykes went to South America after Colonel Sterling died—Tom was sixteen, I believe, and Louise a year or so younger—and it was agreed between them that when Tom was established in business he would return for the girl. They plighted their troth when they were scarcely out of pinafores, yet they remained faithful to each other. It was the most idylic match I ever heard of.

"They corresponded—Louise and Tom—very regularly, and I believe that Tom was the only living soul to whom the loyal girl ever betrayed any doubt as to Merritt's character. She continued to gloss over her brother's sins to those who knew him, and he—the ungrateful wretch—did not even thank her. He became as well known as any man about town, a frequenter of hotel bar-rooms and gambling clubs. His affairs with women—creatures of the most abandoned character—were innumerable and it was whispered that during one of his sprees he had married a low-born singer from one of the concert halls.

"These stories of course reached the ears of the gentle little sister, but she never betrayed the pain they gave her by word or look—that is, in Merritt's presence. But I knew it wore upon her so that her health was breaking down under the strain, and I wrote to Tom Thorndyke about it. They had already agreed that he was to come on and marry her on her twenty-first birthday. It had been my suggestion, for Merritt had made a fearful mess of his own share of the property, and I could not trust Louise a day with her share of her father's estate in her absolute possession. Merritt could wheedle almost anything he wished out of her, and I was determined to secure her from his macchinations.

"Tom took my hint and one day, a few weeks after I had written, Louise came into my office with the happiest light on her face I had seen there in a long time.

"'Tom is coming North sooner than he expected, Uncle,' she said. (She had always called me 'uncle' from babyhood.) 'He may be here at almost any time. He has already started, but will probably remain a few weeks in Havana on business for his firm.'

"I showed nothing but surprise and pleasure at the idea of meeting the youngster again.

"'He'll be quite a man now,' said I, never for an instant letting on that I suspected why he was coming so early. It was yet four months to her birthday.

"'Indeed, he will,' said she, with innocent delight. 'I don't suppose we shall know him. Perhaps he will have a beard!' and she laughed. It did me good to hear her! 'You know, he's never sent me a photograph of himself since he went away.'

"And I wonder if he'll know a certain little girl, after six years,' said I, slily. 'She was in short dresses and wore her hair down her back when Master Tom went away.'

"She laughed and blushed. 'It will be quite like a fairy story, won't it?' she said.

"While we were waiting to hear from Tom, Louise and her brother were invited to New York State to join a house party for a week or ten days. Merritt was one of those fellows who never show their dissipation long at a time, and was handsome into the bargain. He was borne with, also, for his sister's sake; that was why society's doors were not closed against him.

"The house at which they visited was not far from New York City, but it was so far away from home that Louise thought none of Merritt's associates, or scandals, would follow him there. But there was one who did.

"Merritt had tired of the music hall singer and had thrown her over. The poor girl, ruined in character, unable to find employment at her old business and burdened with a three months' old child, grew desperate and followed Merritt to this country place, hoping to obtain some concessions, I suppose, by threatening to shame him before his fine friends. But Merritt Sterling was an ugly fellow when he was cornered. It stirred all the devil in him to be threatened.

"He met the girl in a lonely piece of wood some distance from his friend's house and their quarrel waxed fierce. Poor Louise came upon them unexpectedly—in time to see her brutal brother knock the unfortunate woman down and kick her. Before she could cry out, or run to beg Merritt to desist—before her presence was discovered even, by the other actors in the tragedy—a man burst through the bushes and came to the fallen creature's assistance.

"He was a young, athletic fellow, and at that moment his face was very stern indeed. 'What would you do, you dog?' he exclaimed, pushing the half-mad Merritt back from his victim. 'You will do murder yet!'

"Merritt turned upon him with the foulest language. The stranger controlled himself admirably, but kept between the wretch and the girl. Finally Sterling drew a stilletto and sprang like a tiger upon the man who had stayed his hand!

"And there, before the woman he had beaten and the sister whose presence was unsuspected, Merritt Sterling was shot down and instantly killed by his antagonist! It was self-defence—there was no other idea even suggested—but the man who had done the deed did not give himself up, nor could the police find him from the meager description given by the two horrified women.

"Louise was fairly prostrated by the awful incident. I cabled Tom Thorndyke at Havana, but it was a week before I received a reply. He replied that he had been in the interior on business and just returned to the coast, and was then taking the first steamer for New York. Of course, by the time he arrived, the funeral was over and the matter had quieted down to a great extent. There were few to mourn the death of Merritt Sterling.

"Louise got out again; but I saw that it was only the coming of Tom that kept her up. Her body and mind were both racked to the point of collapse by the terrible strain upon them. The physicians agreed with me that the best thing to do was to marry her to Tom immediately and for them to start for the South as soon as the ceremony took place. The association with people and places which reminded her of her brother's death must be broken at once.

"The day Tom was expected, she came to my office. They were to meet here—I had sent a telegram to New York for him to come directly to me on his arrival—and I knew to a minute, almost, the time he would arrive. I had planned to have an errand which would call me from the room just at the right moment, that Louise might meet him alone. She stood beside me here, one hand upon the back of my chair and gazing out of the window. I can imagine how she felt. I could do nothing myself but make a desperate bluff at reading the papers in a court case; but I did not see a line on the sheets that I rustled so industriously.

"Suddenly Louise uttered a low cry. She could not have seen Tom coming, I thought; in truth it would be past belief that she should know him after six years. Yet I sprang up to look myself. My God! the expression on the girl's face was of death. She stood as though stunned, one hand rigidly fixed upon my chair-back, the other against the window pane.

"Slowly her eyes turned from the window and sought the door of the office. I was so marvelously influenced by her manner and appearance that I could not break the spell. In a moment there was a bustle at the entrance and the door flew open.

"'Mr. Thorndyke,' said Upton's voice and the boy entered.

"'Jennison,' exclaimed he, hurrying forward, 'I remember you.' His voice was grave and his face sad and drawn. 'Where is—Louise!'

"He had seen her and his features lit up wonderfully. He stretched out his hand and approached her. 'Louise,' he said, 'do you remember me?'

"She did not look at his face. Her eyes, strangely strained and glittering, were fixed upon that outstretched hand. Her lips moved; and for an instant I did not catch the words. Then I heard her tones, hoarse, unnatural, and sounding hollow and lifeless through the room.

"'My brother's blood! My brother's blood!'

"And then ere we could catch her, she fell stiffly to the floor. She was dead when we reached her."

* * * * * *

"Great heavens, Jennison!" I cried, "do you mean that——"

"Yes, Thorndyke was the man. He had come straight on from Rio Janeiro instead of remaining at Havana. Having some business to transact for his father in and near New York, he stopped there first. Chance—Fate—whatever you care to call it—brought him to that lonely wood at the moment Merritt Sterling was beating his victim. Thorndyke was on his way to catch a train at a way station. He went on after shooting the brute who was, to him, a stranger, and took the first train South, reaching Havana again in five days. He did not fear being tried for the murder, but he feared the effect it might have upon Louise.

"She had been unobserved by him at the time, but his image was indelibly impressed upon her memory. She recognized him immediately upon his appearance at my office and the awful discovery that her brother's slayer was her lover was like the stroke of another bullet through her own heart. I have never been able to remove the mark left by her hand upon that pane."

WHOLESOME ADVICE

For People Whose Stomachs are Weak and Digestion Poor.

Dr. Harlandson, whose opinion in diseases is worthy of attention, says when a man or woman comes to me complaining of indigestion, loss of appetite, sour stomach, belching, sour watery risings, headaches, sleeplessness, lack of ambition and a general run down nervous condition I advise them to take after each meal one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, allowing the tablet to dissolve in the mouth, and thus mingle with the food eaten. The result is that the food is speedily digested before it has time to sour and ferment. These tablets will digest food anyway whether the stomach wants to or not, because they contain harmless digestive principles, vegetable essences, pepsin and Golden Seal which supply just what the weak stomach lacks.

I have advised the tablets with great success, both in curing indigestion and to build up the tissues, increase flesh in thin nervous patients, whose real trouble was dyspepsia and as soon as the stomach was put to rights they did not know what sickness was.

A fifty cent package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be bought at any drug store, and as they are not a secret patent medicine, they can be used as often as desired with full assurance that they contain nothing harmful in the slightest degree; on the contrary, any one whose stomach is at all deranged will find great benefit from the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. They will cure any form of stomach weakness or disease except cancer of the stomach. Full size package at druggists 50 cents. Send to F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., for little book on stomach troubles, mailed free.

KATRINA.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

NAMES were only a means of temporary identification at Dead Level Bar, and when a man so far forgot the place as to ornament himself with two and perhaps even three, merely because they happened to have been given or bequeathed, he was sternly thrust back to the reproach of "Soap or B'ar's Grease" or "Comb an' Brush," or something else equally appropriate and distasteful. As among the Indians, there was a custom of using anything convenient until a man had earned the right to something distinctive and honorable. That was how tenderfoot "Cub" of six months before, was veteran Pistol Bill of to-day, and why pink-faced, swearing Bobby had become Blue-Blazes.

Dead Level Bar was attractive to strangers. Pay-dirt had been struck by the first comers, and pay-dirt had been the rule ever since. Two ounces a day was a fair average for a river-bottom man, but three ounces was better. And naturally it was the river-bottom mining that set labor rates for the ponderous crushers on the hillside.

It was high—preposterous—of course; but the mine owners did not complain, for every jar of their machinery turned three figures into their pockets. A day meant a competence, a week a fortune, and a month was something that made even the wildest visions gasp for breath.

So the unskilled dago, and the Chinaman, and shirk from Alabama, and the red-headed man from Cork, alike received their two ounces a day; while a moderately skilled laborer was in demand at twice and even thrice that sum. Occasionally a man came who was thoroughly conversant with mining machinery, or with analyzing or prospecting, and he was a Croesus who could command his own rules and his own time and his own reward. And yet the miners on the hillside were always short of help. Newcomers preferred the possibility of three ounces a day to the certainty of two, and the skillful were generally visionary enough to dream of the vast wealth which every turn of their spade might disclose.

Among the arrivals one day was a blue-eyed, flaxen-haired German, who towered head and shoulders above his companions, and whose first act on alighting was to snatch a pail from the driver's seat and go in search of water for the horses.

"Dey vass t'irsty," he remarked, sententiously, as he went from one to another, watching them carefully and giving water only as he thought judicious, and not as the panting animals craved. "In de German army we our horses vass looked after."

Then he stood back and gazed about curiously, his shoulders square and his right arm bent slightly at the elbow, as though the hand were resting upon the hilt of a sword. One of the mine owners paused on the opposite sidewalk and regarded him attentively. He, too, had a habit of carrying his arm in that position; and beside there were other things about the upright, soldierly figure which carried him back to certain years of his own in the German army.

An hour later the stranger was installed as the chief engineer of the Gold Bug, with a salary of fifty dollars a day; and with the understanding that he was to have the oversight of other mines, with a corresponding increase of compensation. The blue eyes of the German had grown big with wonder at the munificence of the salary; but the mine owner's had only narrowed and brightened. He knew that another man with this scientific giant's acquirements would have asked a hundred, and been given it without question.

In the books he was entered as Hans, because of the clerk's inability to understand the long, unpronounceable name he gave; but down in camp he was simply Cause, while the burly teamster he one day tossed twenty-feet into the river for beating a horse, became Effect.

Mails were of uncertain arrival at Dead Level Bar. Sometimes they came twice a month; sometimes only once in two months, and sometimes the appearance of road agents prevented them from coming at all. Hans had been there six weeks before a mail came in, and then it was another week before the clerk connected the letter whose address he could not decipher, with the engineer whose name he could not pronounce.

When the letter was brought to him Hans was sitting on a boulder outside the mine, his blue eyes fixed upon a distant point of the horizon with an expression of wistfulness and regret. Five minutes later he was in the superintendent's office.

"I gif my notice," he cried, his face glowing and his blue eyes radiant. "I take de stage in twenty minutes."

"Take—what in twenty minutes? Oh, you want more salary." The superintendent threw his feet into another chair and looked at him expectantly. "Well, how much? Will fifty per cent. increase do?"

"I tell you I take de stage," Hans reiterated. "I gif my notice."

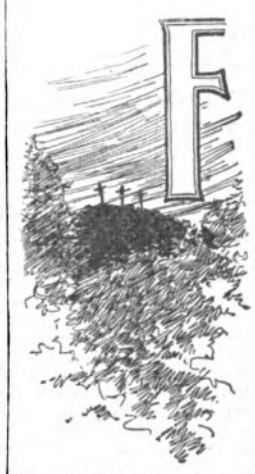
His earnestness was too evident to be mistaken, and the superintendent rose hastily to his feet.

"Come, come, Hans," he expostulated, "think better of it. We'll pay you more than anybody else."

"It is not de pay," eagerly, "you no understand. You been goot to me, and I stay mit you longer as anybody. But now I vass go home—to Katrina. You see," as a slight smile appeared on the youthful face of the superintendent, "it's like dis. Dere vass t'ings tell about me, and Katrina hear dem, and she say to me 'Go!' Den I hear anodder man vass seek her, and I come to America to forget. But no, dere vass no place to forget. When I come to de mountains I see Katrina everywhere, and I hear her voice mit de trees and when I dream. Now dis," holding the letter up and regarding it fondly, "tells me dat Katrina is waiting, and it say de lies mit me are all discover and dat de odder man is punish."

"I am glad to hear it, Hans," said the superintendent heartily, "but still I think you ought to remain with us. Why, just think of it, man; six months of this work and you can go back and build a castle for Katrina."

But Hans raised himself to his full height and looked down compassionately.



"You is young man," he said, "and do not understand dese t'ings. Gold is everywhere, all over de world; but dere is only one Katrina. I gif my notice now and go to de stage. And I say goot-bye."

The superintendent watched him down the hillside and then turned to his desk with a sigh.

"I am a young man," he thought, bitterly, "but I do understand. I have already lost my Katrina."

THE PASSION PLAY.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

FAR off in the mountains of Bavaria, in the little village of Oberammergau, there takes place each year a remarkable performance known as the Passion Play. The first of these performances took place over two hundred and fifty years ago. At that time a plague was afflicting the country, and the people of Oberammergau were among the sufferers. Nearly a hundred people had perished and the terror-stricken survivors vowed that if the plague were removed they would give a dramatic performance every ten years, illustrating the story of the life of Christ, and his sufferings, for the enlightenment of all mankind.

Strange as it may seem, the plague passed, and the villagers have ever since kept their vow faithfully. At the present time the fame of the Passion Play is world wide. People visit Oberammergau from all over the world to witness the wonderful performance of these simple villagers, who devote their lives to this performance, which with them is a most sacred duty. In the intervals between the plays they engage in their usual vocations, but as only inhabitants of the village are allowed to take part in the performance, and only those whose lives are comparatively blameless, it is considered a disgrace not to take part in the play, while on the other hand, to be permitted to take the part of Christ is the highest possible honor.

The last performance of the play was given in 1890, so the next one takes place next year, 1900.

Already the villagers are preparing for their parts. The leading character, of course, is that of Christ. This was taken in 1890 by Joseph Maier, who also represented Christ in 1870 and 1880. Of Maier's impersonation critics have had nothing to say but words of praise. It seems almost sacrilege for any man to attempt to represent Christ, but in Maier's impersonation there is nothing offensive; on the contrary, there is everything to love and to admire.

Maier is held in the greatest reverence by his fellow-villagers, and in his private life is a sensitive, refined, and modest man, leading a pure and blameless life and devoted to his work, his home and his family. He has had flattering offers from theatrical managers but will consider none of them, preferring the quiet and peace of his native village and his part in the Passion Play, which he regards as a most solemn religious duty.

Of the other characters it need only be said that they perform their parts ably and conscientiously, acting from a sense of religious duty, accepting their part as an honor, and with no thought of gain. This will be better understood when it is known that of the proceeds the actors receive only a sum equal to what they would have earned from equal time employed at their usual labor. The most of the money is spent for public improvements, and among other things, a school for wood-carving has been erected with this money.

The theater itself is a large wooden auditorium partially roofed over, and with a large stage, for in some of the scenes six hundred people take part. The air is mild and the play is too engrossing for the audience to mind an occasional shower, for the performance goes on rain or shine.

A cannon is fired as a signal that the drama is to begin, and the strains of the orchestra are heard in a solemn overture. The music as now performed was written by a former schoolmaster of the village, a man of remarkable musical ability, while the text was written in its present form by Father Daisenberger, a former priest of the village, who died in 1883. He also adapted some of the plays of Schiller for the use of his parishioners, and persuaded them to build an open-air theater, instead of giving their performances in the churchyard.

Through this good priest many of the incongruous features of the earlier performances were eliminated. For example, it used to be the custom for the devil and his imps to take part in the performance, appearing at intervals, and finally rushing upon Judas after the crucifixion of Christ. It was also customary in former days, just before the performance, for a messenger to rush upon the stage with a letter from the devil, urging the audience to make all the noise and disturbance possible, in order to interrupt the play, and promising them great rewards if they succeeded in so doing. But now these features have been omitted, and the play is consequently improved.

Eighteen acts and twenty-five tableaux, with chorus singing in the intervals, makes up in the Passion Play. The acts represent scenes in the life of Christ, beginning with his entry into Jerusalem, and portraying the events of his life until his resurrection. The tableaux are symbolic; scenes from the Old Testament which are considered prophetic or later events during the life of Christ.

The performance lasts all day and through it all the audience sit spellbound. The peasants from the country round regard the play as a sacred service, and will undergo any sacrifice to witness it. Others are sightseers who are powerfully affected by the vivid pictures and scenes, which are so real as to be positively painful. One sits through the play with heartfelt interest and feels at the end that he has been witnessing a real tragedy. What could more vividly bring to mind the life and sufferings of Christ than witnessing such a performance? Unimpressionable indeed would be he who could sit unmoved through a performance of the Passion Play—who could leave without realizing more deeply and fully the meaning of the story of Christ.

In Germany there is an institution called "The Housewives' Union," which devotes itself to the servant girl question. It has places for the training of servants, and it gives prizes for good ones. A girl who stays five years in one place gets a gold pin with an inscription which states that she is a good servant; and after she has been ten years in the same family she gets ten marks, or $2.50 in gold. At the end of twenty years she gets five dollars in gold, and if she remains with the same family thirty years at the close of this period she receives a present of thirty marks or six dollars in gold. It may be interesting to many to know that servants often remain thirty years with the same family in Germany. In this country it is the exception, and an exception very seldom found, that a servant will remain thirty years in one place. We greatly fear, too, that American servants would think $2.50 for ten years of service, or six dollars for thirty years, a very small reward.

The great fire of London, which occurred in 1666, exceeded all previous fires in magnitude, although there had already been some severe ones in London. It followed closely on the Plague, by which, in 1665, the city lost nearly one fifth of its population, and caused extreme consternation, not only by the losses occasioned by it but by the universal feeling of the people that the city was doomed to destruction in some way. The fire started at one o'clock of the morning of September second and raged for five days. 396 acres of houses were totally destroyed and others partially so. In all, 400 streets, 13,200 houses, 88 churches, St Paul's Cathedral, and four city gates were either damaged or destroyed. The money loss was 4,000,000 pounds sterling.

SAVE THE MEN

Women Now Have a Glorious Opportunity to Rescue Men From the Terrors of Drunkenness—a Secret Remedy given in Tea, Coffee or Food that Cures the Drunkard Without His Co-operation.

Free Trial Package of This Magnificent Cure Mailed Free to Every Lady who Writes—Do not Delay but Send at Once for the Free Trial and Test It.

Who can doubt that there is a cure for drunkenness when we have such an eloquent and emphatic statement from Mrs. Katie Lynch, 329 Ellis St., San Francisco, Cal., she says:—My husband was a hard drinker. There never was a doubt in my mind but what liquor had so worked upon his nerves as to actually control his appetite. Like most men who drink he was kind and generous when sober, but the rum demon usually had the better of him and his wife had to suffer. One day I concluded to try a remedy called Golden Specific, which it was said would cure the liquor habit secretly. So I mixed some of it with Mr. Lynch's food for a few days and put a little in his coffee. I could scarcely conceal my agitation and fear less he should suspicion me for he had suddenly taken a dislike to liquor, said he despised the stuff, and was the most remarkably changed man you ever saw. I kept bravely at it determined to not waver in any attempt to cure him and I soon found out that my mission was a complete success and that Golden Specific had wrought almost a miracle for me. I want other women to profit by my example and am glad to learn that Dr. Haines, who discovered Golden Specific, will generously send a free trial package to every woman who writes for it.

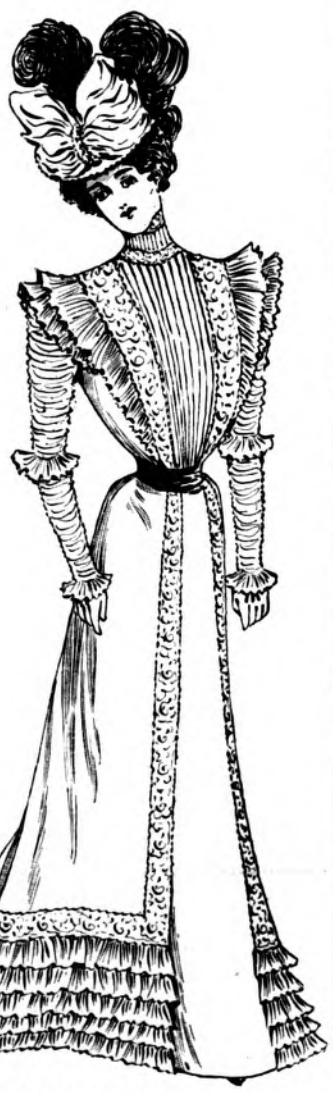
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



MID-SUMMER fabrics are supremely fascinating, to my mind, more so than has been the case for several seasons. One of the foremost of these numerous lovely stuffs is berege; not the old-fashioned material long ago known by that name, but a clever cross between crepe and berege, rendering it (so modistes testify), much more durable, and less likely to crack, or tear in slits.

Crepe de chines are also very much in vogue, as are nun's veilings, silky cashmeres, etc. A most fetching gown built of berege in the softest, palest shade of tan has its skirt cut circular, and intersected with dainty lace insertions and applique of yellow Honiton. This is set over a skirt of silvery green taffeta finished at the foot by a 3-inch plaiting. The round bodice is accordion pleated from shoulder to belt, with broad bands of the lace extending into the belt from the shoulder seams. Finishing touches of black velvet ribbon at the throat and belt complete a most airy, yet serviceable costume for a warm summer afternoon.

Another pretty frock, somewhat similarly built, is of palest smoke gray nun's veiling, the sheath skirt having a tunic effect by means of applied bands of yellow Honiton lace over white satin; bordering this at the foot are alternate frills of the gray, and white taffeta set very closely together giving a most frou frou finish. The bodice has a softly pleated vest bordered by bands of the lace edged over the shoulders with pleatings matching those used on the skirt. The sleeves are a unique feature, wrinkled across the arm with a pleated frill at both elbow and wrist.

Among pique gowns there are a number of smart new models, an attractive one being shown here, the sheath skirt trimmed with broad straps, so set on as to represent a tunic. The natty little eton coat has a like trimming, giving much jauntiness to the figure, while the fronts are a trifle longer, and are finished by a rolling collar and revers edged with narrower straps. With it is worn a shirt waist of white spotted with scarlet, set off at the throat with a scarf of Roman silk in which scarlet predominates, fastened at the front by a silver clasp.

For the "bike" maiden there is little to offer that is entirely new, and still the sketch offered in our initial, has attractive points to recommend it. The skirt, which is much more clinging than that of last season, is made up of doublefaced material; the right side, a dull dust color, the under side, a large plaid in shades of brown in which white is largely introduced. The hem is turned up on the outside, showing the plaid, and finished at the top with several rows of stitching.

OF GRAY NUN'S VEILING.

The shirt waist, which is an entirely new model, is made up of white pique. The yoke fancifully decorated with straps and stiff little tucks.

Very brilliant are the colorings of some of the new waists, being broadly striped or spotted, the stripes running up and down.

A smart addition to the summer tailor gown is the Admiral collar, made quite separate from the coat, but carefully cut so as to fit exactly, often forming a vest at the front when the coat is worn open. They are made of heavy, creamy white Kersey, beautifully braided with gold, or entirely plain, while very pretty ones are entirely of scarlet stock. Serviceable ones of shrunken white pique are considered au fait. All shirt waist materials should be well shrunken before being made up. Point de' sprit makes the daintest sort of frills for my little lady's best white gown, especially if the material used be thin stuff.

A NATTY ETON JACKET.

A stylish hat to be worn with tailor gowns is a square-crowned sailor, with a narrow, rolling brim bound with black velvet, the crown encircled with a broad band of the same, finished at the side with an upstanding bow set off by a couple of black quills. A similar hat has a scarf of gray and white striped silk, draped about the crown, with a soft knot at the side in which are inserted a couple of gray wings. Both are exceedingly good style. A pretty way to renovate last season's sailor hats, if they happen to be white straw, is to trim them with a band of black velvet and clusters of black wings, arranged at each side of the front, with perhaps a little black tulle or net to soften the effect. The frenzy for hats flared off the face has almost entirely subsided, the far more comfortable fashion of wearing the hat well over the face being popular to a degree.

A modish finish for the neck, with a linen collar, is a broad ribbon brought around the throat and fastened in the front by a silver clasp. They are shown in the shops in a variety of styles, and are wonderfully reasonable in price.

The newest thing in face veils shows dots of chenille, nearly as large as a ten cent silver piece, set quite a space apart.

A new and most comfortable fancy is to finish the skirt of a tailor-made gown with a stitched belt of velvet, fastened to the skirt all ready to adjust at a moment's notice.

Leather belts are being pushed into the background by those of ribbon belting, the latter being far more pliable and yielding to the figure, hence more becoming, a fact quickly discovered by the fair sex.

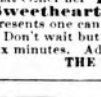
SOME SUPERSTITIONS ABOUT DIAMONDS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

LOOKING through some old volumes recently, I came upon one which gave what was at that time I suppose, a most learned discourse on the subject of diamonds. Some of the statements made would cause a modern scientist to smile, but then, perhaps in the course of a few hundred years our descendants will think our assertions as ridiculous.

In the first place, we have the growth of the diamond. "They are found in a mass that cometh out of gold, and when the mass is broken open some are found as great as peas. They are commonly found upon the rocks in the sea and upon hills where a mine of gold is. They have children which grow larger and larger year by year, and are nourished by dew from heaven. If they are taken with a little of the rock on which they are found, and kept wet with dew, they may be made to grow, and the small diamond becomes great."



Here are some of its virtues. The owner of a diamond according to this account, is lucky indeed. "The diamond should be worn upon

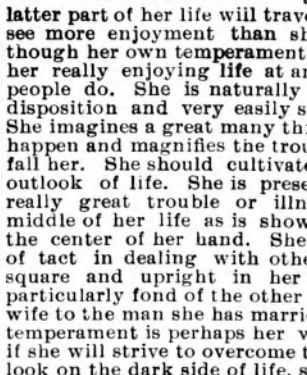
CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

I REGRET to say that many of the COMFORT readers who desire their hands read in this department are very careless about sending their impressions properly marked so that they can be connected with their letters. Some hands come to me with nothing on them to tell where they come from or to whom they belong; then again letters come saying that hands have been sent, but not giving any clue by which we can find their hands even if they had been received at this office. It is much the safest way to enclose the hands and the letters in the same wrapper and pay full postage on them as then we are not likely to lose them. Where they come separately they do not always reach us and as I said it is often impossible to connect the impressions with the right letters.

If the lady who wrote from Sioux City with regard to "Lygia's" hand will send a new impression and mention what she writes about in her letter of Feb. 16th, I will give it a new reading. We also had a letter from a lady in Chalk Mound, Kan., stating that she has sent hands and complying with the necessary conditions for reading. The hands have never been received. If she will forward them again, I will hold her letter. Also the lady from Portland, Oregon, signing "M. A." has never had her reading because her hands have not been received. If these can be attended to by the writers, I shall be glad to do my part towards them.



"Scholar" has sent a plaster caste of only the palm of his hand. As I have often said, it is necessary to see the size and shape of the entire hand, the relative size and condition of the fingers and both the right and left hand impressions in order to give an accurate reading; however, as he asks for a reading of these lines, I will do my best with it. "Scholar" has a long life and will see many changes. His health in childhood was delicate, and although he was very ambitious he was often hindered from accomplishing what he desired on account of his delicate health. A strange influence at work in this life. At about the age of forty a line arises from the life line going to the Mount of Apollo which contains an island. If this is shown in both hands it would indicate that this person is connected with some scandal at that age which would affect his reputation. There are many lines which droop from the life line after the age of fifty, indicating various troubles which I should say might come from poor health and loss of friends, rather than from poverty, as the line on Apollo indicates wealth. There is a very strong fate line indicating great success and although the hand is very hollow I think a successful career with gratified ambitions and wealth will come. Some very strong friendship formed in childhood follows at a distance through life, although somewhat removed from this person. A love affair in early life also results in disappointment. I should think, however, that a successful marriage took place not far from the age of forty. This is a very interesting hand, although as I have said, it is impossible to give definitely the positive happenings.

"B. Hunt" has sent a variety of good impressions. He has a strongly-marked hand which indicates good business talent and, in the main, good business judgment. He is, however, a little too much afraid to venture; when he feels that a certain venture would be a good one, he does not always have the courage to carry it out. He is developing this sort of courage and that will result in financial success. He makes his own way in the world, although he is somewhat helped by outside influences. He has a very strong will and much tact in dealing with others. He will have his own way in most things, but knows how to get it without antagonizing people. His health after the age of twenty is good up to old age. He has some interferences in his business career and will have to make a hard fight from thirty to fifty, but he will succeed owing to his now force of character in whatever he undertakes. He has an uncommon force and power over others. A clear head, good judgment and charity for the failings of others will help him in many a tight place. He is a very ambitious man and will succeed in fulfilling his ambitions, although the best of his success will not come until he is about forty-five to fifty. After that, riches and comfort will be his. He is preserved from some illness or other calamity during the ages of twenty-five to thirty-five and will marry at about the age of thirty-five or forty. I see but one marriage here. In this, as in other things, he will use good judgment, will be faithful and true and affectionate, but will never be carried off his feet by passion as some men are. There will be some strong influence come into his life at about the age of fifty which will affect it very favorably thereafter. He will travel during the latter part of his life and I think will die in a foreign land. He has the gift of oratory and will succeed as a lawyer or in any career where his persuasive powers have full play. He must not be discouraged if he meets with some obstacles to financial success during the early part of his career, as he has an uncommonly favorable hand with exceptionally good results after he is fifty. He has perseverance and good courage which will help him to work and achieve definite results. I see no signs of bad luck in his hand but a steady growth from beginning to end.

"B. HUNT."

"Mrs. J. J. R." does not give me a nom de plume and therefore I must use the initials to her name which was sent in December. She asks for a special reading to be sent by mail. Several people have asked this, but the conditions are that they shall be read in the paper for the benefit of all.

"Mrs. J. J. R." has had a great deal of trouble. Her childhood was not only troubled with delicate health, but she was in some way bound and subjected to others in a way which hindered her happiness. She was married young, and I should say made a rather sudden match which has not proved happy. Several great griefs have come to her through it and a period of some fifteen years or more she has seen or will see a good deal of trouble. I do not think she has had any children, at least she ought not to have had. After the age of forty-five, when a new influence comes into her life, however, she will find things much smoother and more comfortable. I think she will marry again at that age. If not, some strong friendship comes into her life then, which will materially help her the rest of her days. She needs to be very careful of her health from fifty to sixty as there is some danger of a severe illness at that time. She will live on after that to a good old age and during the latter part of her life will travel somewhat and see more enjoyment than she has done, although her own temperament is rather against her really enjoying life at any time as some people do. She is naturally of a melancholy disposition and very easily swayed by others. She imagines a great many things which never happen and magnifies the troubles that do befall her. She should cultivate a more cheerful outlook of life. She is preserved from some really great trouble or illness, during the middle of her life as is shown by a square in the center of her hand. She has a good deal of tact in dealing with other people and is square and upright in her life. She is not particularly fond of the other sex, but is a true wife to the man she has married. Her nervous temperament is perhaps her worst enemy and if she will strive to overcome this and refuse to look on the dark side of life, she will find this world a much more cheerful place.

"MRS. J. J. R."

It is much better to have the fate-line broken and interrupted at the beginning or lower end, than to have it so at the upper end, as the latter indicates the closing years of life and if they are to be successful the lines should be clear and strong, or helped out by other lines at that age. If the line is strong and irregular in a hand that is much cut up by lines and cross rays it indicates an irritable temper. A long fate line reaching up to the middle finger indicates a long life and even helps out a short life line. A cross on this line indicates a change of prospects at the age indicated by its position on the line. A star at the base of this line denotes a loss of fortune in early youth. An island on this line shows conjugal infidelity in a bad hand, or a hopeless love in a good hand.

SOME SUPERSTITIONS ABOUT DIAMONDS.

the left side, for it is of greater virtue there, for the strength of its growing is towards the north, that is the left side of the world, and the left part of man, when he turneth his face toward the east. He who carries a diamond will have strength and manhood; it will keep him from harm, especially from broken limbs. It will give him victory over all his enemies, if his cause is righteous. It will keep him from strife and riots, and is a talisman against enchantments. In fact if an enchanter tries to work a spell upon the possessor of a diamond, he will find it will work upon himself instead. No wild beast will attack the diamond's owner. It heals all manner of mental troubles. If poison be brought near it, the diamond will become moist and sweat.

"In order to be of the greatest virtue, the diamond must be given freely instead of being bought."

Here, according to our authority, is the way to detect genuine diamonds. First cut with them or write on crystal. Then take a piece of adamant, or lode stone and a compass. If the diamond is genuine the compass will not be affected by the lode stone while the diamond is near.

Sometimes, through the misbehavior of its owner, the diamond loses its virtue and then we suppose the owner must either reform or give his diamond to some better owner.

The average weight of an American man is one hundred forty-one and one-half pounds; of a woman one hundred twenty-four and one-half.

The month of roses and "[illegible]ments" and weddings. All topics for suggestive moralizing but the spirit of June is too optimistic. Let us forget December and revel in the "[illegible]."

June. "Then if ever come perfect days." There is an invitation in the sky, the air, the earth, the sea. They say so unmistakably, "Won't you come out and play" that he who lingers must be deaf indeed.

The world now has a chance to wag on carelessly, merrily, without any analysis of things as they are or prophesies of things as they "ought to be." In other words the woman's clubs have shut up shop, drank their last cup of tea, read their last paper and subsided for two months into the great mass of femininity that never has any definite purpose. Even "Queen Lavinia" has wrapped her crown and scepter up in moth balls and gone fishing. The greatest relief is not to the world that escapes being taken seriously for two months, but to the poor purposeful women who are given a chance to forget themselves for the same time. "Silence like a poultice comes to heal the blows of sound."

There is an occasional striking illustration of the old proverb "the mills of the gods grind slowly but they grind exceeding small." Poor old Roger Williams, who vanished from Massachusetts in 1635, at last is in a fair way to have justice done him. The legislature of Massachusetts has been humbly petitioned to revoke the sentence of banishment. It is urged upon them that one man in those far off times felt the injustice of the act. John Winthrop, the old Puritan governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony urged in vain that the sentence be repealed. It still stands upon the statute books of the state. The sentiments for which Roger Williams was driven into the wilderness are to-day the universal belief of the Republic. Entire and complete religious freedom has spread beyond the confines of the little state and is undisputed even in the old Puritan colony that drove the apostle of religious liberty from its domain. On the face of it, the demand to revoke the sentence of banishment against a man a century dead would provoke a smile and a jest. But there is a deep significance in the act. Religion is a personal matter between man and his Maker and all systems that have tried to intervene whether they were Church or State, have found themselves set aside by the onward progress of events.

The sunbonnet of our grandmothers is very much in evidence these June days. On the golf grounds, at the seaside or the mountains bright young faces peer bewitchingly out of a mass of frills and frippery that go to make up the modern sunbonnet. Last year a few sunbonnets appeared but the "fad" was to go bare headed. This year the bonnets seem to be firmly fastened in popular favor. There are many who recall the pink and green gingham abominations of their childhood with wonder as they gaze at their modern substitutes. The old sunbonnet were purely utilitarian. They had wide stitched spaces where slats of pasteboard were inserted. This made a stiff circle of ugliness around the face. Many were rebellious against the sunbonnet—how many times it was lost and how altogether and pleasantly naughty it was to tie the stringy strings in a hard knot and let the freckle shielder dangle at the back of the neck. What blissful elegance when one was allowed to wear a hat! So fickle Dame Fashion has waved her wand and the old-time horror is a thing of beauty. The sailor and the Alpine are stiff and mannish and the knowing maiden retreats behind the shade of her coquettish frills of lace and organdy and re-lives the old rhyme, "Tying her bonnet under her chin, she ties a young man's heart within."

The free people of the United States and the lovers of liberty the world over are taking an intense interest in the subject of Finnish freedom. The little peninsula of Finland is naturally a part of Sweden but in 1809 it passed into the control of Russia. It was, however, allowed to keep its separate Parliament. Finland grew and flourished under the mild rule of Russia. Its people are educated and progressive. Suddenly the "Great White Czar" who has been purchasing the most advanced theories of government, has issued a most tyrannical edict in respect to Finland. Her Parliament is to be abolished, Russian is to be the official language taught in all the schools, a Russian governor is to be sent from St. Petersburg and in every way the people of Finland are to be Russianized. The Finns in this country are using every effort to influence public sentiment and by the signing of petitions to prevent the loss of their freedom. The little peninsula is in a fever of patriotic protest. There are nearly 200,000 Finns in the United States and their effort and those of their countrymen at home are giving the world at large an extensive knowledge of this little known section, the peninsula of Finland. The former Czar promised them autonomy when the peninsula was ceded to Russia, and they demand faith from his descendant Nicholas.

The spring and summer of 1899 have brought some remarkable tercentenary events. April was the three hundredth anniversary of the birth of Oliver Cromwell, the man who shaped the revolutionary forces of a religious rebellion into a powerful lever that raised the plain people to a position they never have lost in England. June brings the three hundredth anniversary of one of the great masters of art—Velasquez. He was born at Seville in June 1599. He was of Portuguese descent. He began to study art in the old Spanish city. He learned more than the art of painting in the house of his instructor and soon married the daughter of his master. All of Velasquez's early paintings are of peasant life. It was this contact with reality that made his work so strong a contrast to that of the school of idealists. He began to paint portraits and by a succession of fortunate acquaintances finally reached the King. His portrait of Philip IV. of Spain gave him instant and lasting fame. He was the court painter and many of the haughty grandees of Spain in the hour of her greatness look forth to-day from the canvasses of Velasquez. Every mark of royal favor was showered upon the once obscure painter. The Cross of Santiago was awarded him. This was a favor bestowed until then only upon the nobility. Velasquez painted a portrait of Charles I., the victim of the storm of Puritan rage that Cromwell directed. This portrait is unfortunately lost. Velasquez painted landscapes and historical paintings of great value but it is in his portraits that he is seen at his best. There is a force, a penetration, a directness about them that carries conviction. The spirit of the age he painted lives in the work of the great Spanish master. There are but few specimens of Velasquez's work in this country and those few by no means show him at his best. By far the greatest and most valuable of his works are among the art treasures of Madrid. The tercentenary is to be celebrated with becoming ceremonies. One cannot fail, however, to draw a mournful historical parallel between the Spain of Velasquez and the Spain that celebrates his three hundredth birthday.

This is in every sense an altruistic age. If the world does not grow better it will not be because men and women of this nineteenth century do not give of their time, their talent, and their wealth to accomplish that end. We grow more and more in the appreciation of the fact that man's material surroundings have a powerful ethical influence. Bare walls, unsightly buildings and sordid surroundings produce a barrenness of soul that gives pitiful results. A factory and a factory town usually show only the hard side of unlovely toil. One western factory owner has produced a moral revolution in a town where his factory buildings were long the crowning eyesore of a general desolation. A bed of flowers was planted in the middle of a grass plot. The spot of brightness found an answering gleam in tired eyes. Then the practical owner realized some lack in the general effect and with hard-headed business sense called in a landscape gardener and gave the factory grounds into his hands. The factory was worse than a desert, it was an inhabited horror, but it was made to "blossom as the rose." The influence of the vines, flowers and grass extended to the unlovely cottages of the employees. As a result that neighborhood is a bower of beauty. Even June would love to linger there to count her wealth. The whole surroundings of factory and cottages are like some beautiful private park. A healthy spirit of emulation has arisen and prizes are offered for the best results. It is an idea that deserves wider adoption. The factory owner became so much interested that he paid for horticultural lectures during the winter. Lantern slides gave views taken at Cornell and at the home of Helen Gould at Irvington. All that science and wealth could command was at the disposal of the employees. An oath is rarely heard there now, gossip is about trees and plants. The "garden" condition has brought back some of the other conditions of Eden. All because one practical man tried an experiment in altruism.

THE RALEIGH TWO STEP.

THE RETURN OF THE RALEIGH.

The First of Dewey's Famous Fighters Reaches Home.

Probably no arrival of any ship in America has caused the interest which did the return of the Raleigh from the Philippines last month. Her voyage from Manila through the Suez Canal and Mediterranean was a series of grand ovations, none exceeding in spirit those of the British garrisons and the welcomes of England's fleets at the various stations on the way home.

When the good ship reached New York she was welcomed with an enthusiasm which will be remembered for years by those that witnessed it. For several days New York was in possession of the gallant officers and tars of the Raleigh. American enthusiasm always brings forth music commemorative of any event of national importance and the return of this war vessel which took such a conspicuous part in the greatest naval engagement of modern times, naturally could be no exception to this rule. As a consequence there have been a number of works of more or less merit produced by enthusiastic composers.

But it has been reserved for COMFORT to publish for the first time one of those grand swinging two-steps which seem to have the triumphant martial spirit breathing in every note. So appropriate to this particular occasion was this composition that the composer could have made no more happy a hit than to name it for this popular ship, whose name at this time is on the tongue of every patriot.

With this little explanation COMFORT feels that every player who shall try this famous two-step will be able to throw in more expression and a livelier air of joy, as every musician realizes how much the spirit has to do with the production of music. But this is particularly true whenever the prevailing spirit of a piece is intended to be one of the deeper emotion, such as the triumph of an armed force.

But turning from this event in our nation's history to the future we see that in a short time the Raleigh will be followed by one even greater, the Olympia, which will bear to our shores the great naval hero, Admiral Dewey. At that time we may look for many more pieces of appropriate musical welcome of which COMFORT hopes to produce at least one of sufficient value to make it of lasting value.

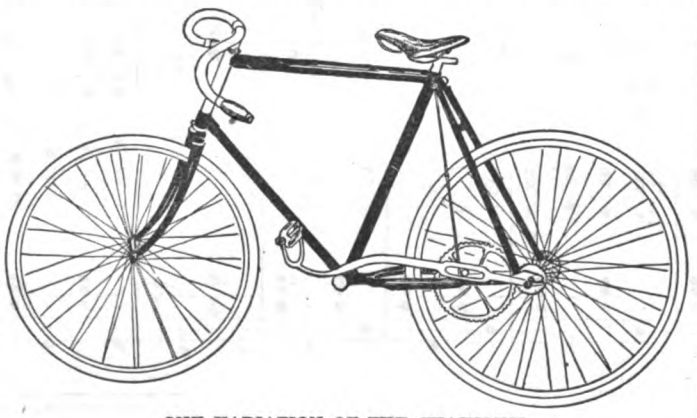
It is pleasant at such a time to contemplate how much better able people are to judge the real merit of music than they were a few years ago. While at no time have Americans been deficient in musical taste, still at no time until a comparatively recent date has the general public been educated to a point where really fine music was appreciated as well as that of an ordinary class. It is probable that there would not have been that wonderful increase in musical cultivation had the art been kept in a position where only the rich could indulge in it, as was the case up to a few years ago.

Until then really good music was sold only at high prices, save only when some firm brought out a small book collection. But the reduction in the price of paper and the introduction of modern methods and machinery in printing and production have entirely revolutionized the situation, and now the best sheet music of full size and exactly as formerly sold from 40 cents to $1.00 a number reaches the buyer at about the cost of mailing alone.

How can this be? You ask. It seems impossible and yet really nothing is simpler. COMFORT makes a musical offer on another page for you and your friends. Try it, and if you have a shadow of dissatisfaction we will promptly return your money. More we could not promise nor can we expect you to understand the wonderful bargain until you yourself see it.

From thousands of delightful letters in appreciation of our attempt to make good music popular by placing it in homes practically without cost we copy one or two. "I have recommended the music to several friends," writes Mrs. George Hall, 204 Sheridan St., Brantford, Ont., "who are going to send for some. It is just as good as any 40c. or 60c. music here, and you may say I said so." "I received my music in good form," says Mary K. Young, 1415 Lincoln Ave., Pittsburg, Pa. "I am much pleased with music and type and wonder how you can sell it so cheap. You will get my custom, and also all my friends. I will send for more." Thus from city, town or country come always the same warm words of pleasure and surprise. Read the offer and give it just one trial.

Cuba has had several names in history. The first was Antilla, then Juana, after a Spanish prince. Ferdinanda was the third name, Santiago the fourth, then the Isle of Ave Maria. The original Indian name, Cubanacan, signifying "where gold is found," was finally adopted and this has been shortened to Cuba.



CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

ALTHOUGH the automobile is engaging the attention of the newspapers and the class of people who seek the novel wherever it may be found, the bicycle is just as popular as ever; even more so. The demand for wheels has been so great that many stores have turned patrons away, and nearly all have opened evenings in order to accommodate the spring rush of trade. One Chicago concern disposed of 358 wheels in one day last week, and others are about on a par. The men who are handling the thirty-inch wheel report remarkable success. The chainless wheel continues to get its share of the patronage, but on the whole the demand seems to be as well divided as the classes of wheels.

The accompanying illustration shows a variation of the ordinary chainless, and one which has its advantages. We have the privilege of using a photograph for our cut, which has never been given for illustration before. The inventor is Mr. F. J. Repp, and it seems to us he has a good thing. Patents have been applied for both in America and foreign countries and no doubt it will soon be on the market. This wheel has a large and small straight cog-gear on each side with lever pivoted on rear axle, a slot in said levers engaging crank pins and the said shanks being fastened to large cog-gears, through frame with ball bearings. These levers move up and down, instead of in circular movement, and the pedal crank sprocket and chain impart the motive power to the rear wheel. The advantages gained by this invention are said to be the doing away with the troublesome chain and with imperfections in bevel gearing, it is less tiresome to ride, as the up and down movement requires only two-thirds of the movement of legs and feet required in circular crank movement. Pants guards are unnecessary as the feet always remain above the levers and pedals. This would be a great advantage to lady riders, as it does not necessarily require short skirts, and dress guards are not needed. Another advantage over all heretofore invented chainless wheels which have an objectional wide tread is that the tract on this can easily be made at two inches and even less; the pedals being placed in the center of the levers instead of outside, as on the old-fashioned crank. It will be noticed that on this invention the mechanism is concentrated in a very small space by the rear wheel, not even reaching as far as rim of rear wheel, so that it can be covered with a small transparent case insuring well-lubricated cogs free from grit, and wear, and less friction. This wheel can easily be kept clean and apparently does away with the objections of not being able to see the nature of the mechanism of the wheel they are riding. The wheel can be made of the same weight as usual run of wheels.

Another brand new design in bicycle construction shows a wheel which is apparently without any means of transmitting the power from the pedals to the driving wheel. There is no visible drain, and likewise no awkward bevel gearing exposed to view. The fact is, there are two chains, but they are snugly stowed away in the depths of the tubes which comprise the frame construction. The advantage of two chains is that the strain on the parts of the wheel is evenly distributed. When the bicycle is in motion these chains are constantly revolving through the triangles formed by the rear tubing, the apex of this triangle being directly under the seat, where they pass over a pulley. A pedal shaft is mounted in one of the lower corners of the said frames, the shaft of the drive wheel being passed through the lower corner and a supplemental shaft passing through the apices of the frame, both shafts being supplied with sprocket wheels. The outer edge of the larger sprocket is fitted into the slot openings of the frame, so that the chain in making a tour of the triangle passes completely over both wheels. The tubing affords such complete protection that there is rarely any occasion for removing it for any purpose whatever, but means are provided for doing this should the occasion arise.

ONE VARIATION OF THE CHAINLESS.

A new gear for a chainless wheel has come upon the market. It consists of a large intermediate wheel to connect the sprocket with the rear wheel. The gears of the front and rear wheels are meshed into the immediate gear, which is made of two rings, one forged within the other. The mechanism is accurate and the whole is encased. The designs lack beauty, but there is no extra weight. In view of the growing popularity of the chainless wheel, new gears are to be expected.

Another new invention is an electric light which can be recharged by a contrivance attached to the wires of an ordinary incandescent lamp. A manufacturer has recently produced one and claims that it is soon going to be a common thing. His directions for charging the electric lamp are given as follows: Remove the incandescent lamp from electric fixture and screw socket in its place. Then screw incandescent lamp in socket. Remove the small incandescent bulb from lamp reflector and screw battery-charging tap in its place. Turn on electric light current and touch the ends of wire to a moistened piece of litmus paper. The end that discolors the paper is the negative pole and must be inserted in the proper hole. Insert the other end of the wire in the remaining hole. Simply turn on the screw at the top of the lamp, and if proper connections have been made the large incandescent lamp will light and the recharging of the batteries begin, which, in order to obtain a full charge, should be continued for four hours, but must not be carried further.

Many wildly enthusiastic wheelers, when enumerating the manifold blessings bestowed on humanity by their idol, the bicycle, declare that within twelve months it has accomplished what all the physical culturists have never been able to—made women throw away stays and laces and rely for support on their muscles. Now, the best authorities on women's needs and anatomy do not at all advise her to lay whalebones aside entirely, and it is only a small minority who, when wheeling, think it necessary or advisable to lay aside their corsets. The bicycle corset proper is supposed to give greater freedom and suppleness of motion to the wearer's body than do ordinary stays.

Another invention designed exclusively for the fair sex is called the "blush preventer," and is the brilliant idea of a gentleman named Cherry. It strongly resembles two enormous bat wings which are arranged one at each side of the wheel, in such a manner as to completely conceal the raiment and motion of the rider from the knee down. Whether it will become popular is still a very open question.

Of course, the ideal stocking is the man's be-chess-boarded golf stocking. But very few women can wear them as they are uncomfortably rough. However, there is a mixture of silk and wool, which is very effective in these designs and not at all uncomfortable to wear.

Sure it is that the bicycle has done more to "emancipate" and develop the modern woman than any other invention. It is one of the most powerful factors for health and enjoyment of both men and women, and we can all paraphrae Sancho Panza a little and say:

"God bless the man who first invented the bicycle!" Wherever he may be.

LOGS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

CAN see them as I write, those logs that once were trees. Far up in the wilds of Maine they were cut, their branches lopped off, and the tall, straight trunks, still covered with their thick coating of bark, were dragged through the forests, over rocks and briers, through mud and mire, and flung into the lake to take their long, winding way to the sawmill far down the river—miles away.

From my window just above the bridge I watch them come, toppling helter-skelter over the dam; and as they glide by on the blue water they seem strangely like human voyagers on the stream of life. Hurrying, jostling, pushing, crowding, on they go, each one seemingly caring only for himself, and trying to get the best place; the stronger ever crowding out the weaker, the larger usurping the place of the smaller, mounting upon them, using them as vehicles for their onward progress, and so sailing triumphantly, successfully on above the roar and grind, the wear and tear, the buffetings and misery of the weaker crowd whom they have pushed down and submerged in their own wild struggle for supremacy.

Worn old veterans many of them are, bruised and scarred with the long voyage; some with their bark entirely rubbed away by rough contact with their fellows—the larger number bare in spots. Here comes a hoary old veteran, straight and strong, but utterly stripped of bark, and not a single log to keep him company as he nears the end of his journey. Here comes a rollicking crowd of young, slender logs—too light and small for any great friction with each other; their bark is still intact, and they come dancing gayly on like a party of young folks out on a frolic.

Here is a slender, black log with a very small, short one hugging it closely, and no other log near them; and my fancy pictures the sad young widow and her only child wending their lonely way through life.

Next comes a stalwart father with his wife and family, and behind them, at a safe distance, comes a dapper beau hesitating between two girls, now bobbing over to one and then quickly veering to the other, and I can almost hear him say:

"Oh, happy could I be with either, were t'other dear charmer away!"

Here plods on a crabbed old bachelor all alone, who thinks "women are so extravagant!" Now a bevy of them bear down upon him, seemingly bent upon taking him by storm, but he perceives their intention and turns his back squarely as they draw near, and floats off at a tangent, leaving them poking all their sharp corners at each other.

Yonder speeds along a company of sturdy logs, floating with the current, heads all pointed for the distant haven; with nothing to trouble or annoy them they enjoy each other's society, and behave civilly to each other as gentlemen should; swerving gently from side to side to give room for all knots or elbows. But lo! an eddy is reached. The waters begin to boil and bubble, and threaten to engulf the voyagers, and in an instant the calm courtesy of the crowd has vanished. Each one for himself is now the motto of all, and a struggle for supremacy sets in. The stronger override the weaker, and rush on to success and safety over their submerged and overthrown brothers. So like to poor, weak, selfish humanity.

And so they travel on; ever shifting, ever changing, ever presenting new pictures to my fancy; pictures of human nature in all its weakness and frailty, in all its manliness and strength, in all its need of help, both human and divine.

In East Africa is a river that flows in the direction of the sea but never reaches it. When only a few miles from the Indian Ocean it flows into a desert, where it disappears.

When an ostrich is preparing to hatch, she scratches a hole in the ground about the size of a bushel basket. Eggs are then laid day after day, and are arranged around the hole. When 21 are laid the bird picks them into the hole.

LIGHTNING BUTTER MAKER.

Butter Made in Two Minutes.

I have tried the Lightning Butter Maker you described in your paper, and it is a wonder. I can make butter in two minutes and it is elegant. You get more butter than when you use a common churn. I took the agency and every butter maker that sees it, buys one. I have done splendid and made as high as $38 a week. I have sold three dozen and they give the best of satisfaction. I know I can sell one hundred in this township as they make butter so quickly, and make so much more than common churns and are so cheap. Some one in every township can make $200 or $300 selling them. By writing to W. H. Baird & Co., 24 Baird Building, Pittsburg, Pa., you can get circulars and full information so you can make big money right at home. I have made $60 in the past two weeks, and I never sold anything before in my life.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE question of what kind of a gown to wear on the first long ocean voyage taken by a woman is a momentous one to that woman, and while the reader of this article may not now have in mind a trip to Europe, she doesn't know when it may be possible, and it is just as well to be fortified beforehand for an emergency of this kind. If she can ask the advice of some one who has already taken such a trip, she is in luck—if not, accept these few suggestions for what they are worth.

The knowing woman wears a natty tailor gown on board, and until the steamer has cast off and sailed away. Then she hies herself to her stateroom, removes this gown, packs it carefully into her steamer trunk, and dons a heavy cheviot suit consisting of a skirt and jacket, with a silk blouse. This should be a gown that can stand the spray and the sun, and should be worn all the time when on deck.

She also has in her stateroom a black silk skirt with one or two fancy silk waists, for evening wear, for there are many little entertainments on board an ocean liner.

Of course a mackintosh is indispensable. Most of all will be appreciated a warm, heavy ulster, or cloak with a hood attached, similar to that shown in our sketch—for if she expects to spend much time on deck she will find, even in summer, that a heavy garment of this kind is absolutely necessary, in mid-ocean, and whether promenading or lying in a steamer chair, will consider it her dearest possession. The hood protects the head and neck much more closely and comfortably than a hat possibly could, particularly while lying in a steamer chair. Then the coat, being long, can be pulled about the feet, in addition to the steamer rug—for both are necessary at times.

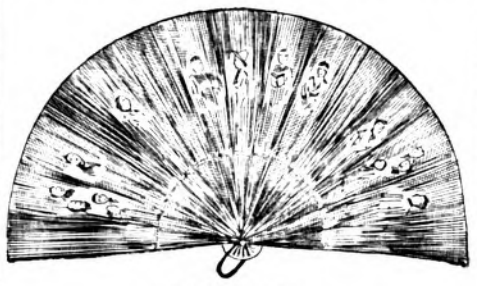
The feet are en evidence on a steamer's deck, therefore the footwear should be carefully attended to. A pair of pretty low shoes, and a pair of heavy, well-fitting boots, are all that is necessary, for deck wear.

Heavy gloves and plenty of veils are necessary—also a few simple remedies in case of sickness, so as not to be dependent upon the ship's doctor. These should include stimulants, smelling salts, etc., and a hot water bottle.

A bathrobe and three or four changes of underwear added to the foregoing, will be all the clothing necessary for steamer use—and these garments can all be packed into the steamer trunk, which is about all the luggage allowed in one's stateroom.

Just before landing, get into the natty tailor gown.

Of course these suggestions are intended for those who intend to stay abroad several months—but as a matter of fact, the trip, if only to last a few weeks, can be very comfortably accomplished with only a dress suit case and shawl strap for luggage. A lady told me recently of a trip which she and her husband took last year, with only this luggage. They were gone six weeks, traveling about continually and so could not be bothered with trunks. They stayed long enough in cities to have their underwear laundered, so were not obliged to take many changes; and right here let me say, that this can be accomplished in one day, abroad; if you send articles to be laundered in the morning they are brought to you again on the evening of the same day. The people I am speaking of didn't even take an umbrella with them, expecting to buy one if it was needed, instead of carrying one around all the time—but in the six weeks they were gone they didn't need an umbrella once. Of course when they came home they had more luggage, having bought some boxes for things they had bought—for what woman can resist a Paris hat?



A COMFORTABLE STEAMER WRAP.

The monogram fan has been superseded by the portrait fan—and society women now have portraits of their friends painted on their fans in all sorts of attitudes and groups. Of course those women less favored by fortune would have to be content with photographs, carefully pasted onto a fan—and this makes a very attractive and often-times a highly-amusing possession.

Here is an idea which will interest the girl whose engagement has just been announced—that is, of course, if her friends get wind of this new fad—which is called a linen shower.

A luncheon is usually given by some married friend of the girl who has announced her engagement—and with the invitations to this luncheon is a suggestion that a piece of linen is to be brought for the girl in whose honor the luncheon is given. Consequently, each guest comes laden with something made of linen—a serviette, a centerpiece, half a dozen napkins with the initials embroidered in one corner, a pair of towels with embroidered initials, finger bowl doileys, tray doileys, in fact, anything that is linen and that will go to make up the necessary items in the new household. All of which are very acceptable, and show to the girl how interested her friends are in the coming event. A girl cannot have too many of these things, and when they are contributed by her friends, and embroidered by them, they gain an added value which increases as the years go by and these pieces of linen live on, while, perhaps, the givers have passed out of the life of the recipient; but she is always reminded of them as she handles the piece of embroidery done by each one, and she never forgets the one who remembered her at the happiest time of her whole life.

A PORTRAIT FAN.

ONE OF THE BRAVEST.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

COL. Richard Henry Savage—soldier, scientist, poet and novelist—has a wonderful and varied store of thrilling adventure and personal experience to draw upon for his fascinating and intensely dramatic novels. One feels instinctively, when reading them, that the writer is describing persons, places and incidents with which he is perfectly familiar.

Born in Utica, N. Y., in 1846, he went five years later with his parents to San Francisco, where he was a pupil in the first public school of that city. As a lad, in the mining districts of California, he saw much of the wild life of that time and had many adventures by flood and field. Graduating with honors at West Point, in 1868 he served, as staff officer, with Generals Halleck, Ord and Thomas, in the west; with General Stone, in Egypt; filled a number of important diplomatic positions abroad; engineered railroads and various works in Texas and California and has traveled pretty much all over the habitable globe with wide-open, observant eyes, making friends in many lands where his novels—translated into several languages—are eagerly read, recalling, to more than one, days gone by.

It is only about eight years since his first novel—"My Official Wife"—was published. It has been translated into a dozen languages; dramatized and played in many places. It was followed, in rapid succession, by some twenty-five others among them, "Prince Schamyl's Wooing," "The Masked Venus," "The Little Lady of Lagunitas," "In The Swim," "A Modern Corsair" and "Lost Countess Falka." "The White Lady of Kamanivatka," just out, is intensely interesting. In his New York home, surrounded by many souvenirs of his wanderings, Col. Savage was busy with his pen when the call to arms a year ago sent him as Colonel of the Second U. S. Vol. Engineers to Cuba. Suffering from malaria and exposure during the campaign, he returned to the States, ten months later, and joined his wife—a strikingly handsome and highly accomplished lady—in Washington where she had been, during the winter, the recipient of a great deal of social attention.

The men of Col. Savage's regiment will soon present a sword to him, none of the officers being allowed to participate in the gift.

Some of the wooden churches of Norway, though over 700 years old, are still in a wonderful state of preservation. This is said to be due to the coats of tar with which they are painted frequently.

The test of a true Persian carpet is to drop a red-hot coal upon it. If the singed wool can then be all brushed away with the hand, leaving no trace of the burn, the carpet is of the best quality.

The material of which the shells of beetles is made is known as chittine. It is a material far more indestructible than steel. Only certain mineral acids affect it. Thus the shells of beetles have been preserved for ages imbedded in rocks, so we know to-day just how the insects looked. The largest beetle in the world comes from Venezuela. When full grown it weighs nearly half a pound.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

CONDUCTED BY COUSIN MARION.

Here's a June greeting to you all, my dears, and may the roses shower upon you and the sweet sunshine of the rarest days of June fall ever across your pathways through life.

And now to the letter-box, and first I lay hands on is from Violet of Monrovia, Ala., who wants to know about wearing of mourning by an eighteen year old girl. It is just as well for a girl of that age not to wear mourning at all, but if she does, the usual rule should be followed. The wearing of mourning is becoming in some localities to be a matter of the taste of the wearer.

Belle, Covington, Ky.—It is correct for a young man of seventeen to call a girl of fourteen Miss. (2) Never heard of a "jewlarky." Something like a Jaberwock, probably.

Fay, Montague, Texas.—Two girls of sixteen may chum together, but don't get too chummy. (2) Don't accept presents of jewelry from young men. (3) Always show your love letters to your mother. She is the safest person in the world for you. (4) Watches are worn, but more for use than ornament.

Hyacinth, Etoile, Ky.—There is no especial harm in paying a few cents for the alleged photograph of "your future husband or wife," but why not pick up any picture and save the money? It is just as likely to be the one.

Fay Green, Chatham, Ills.—When a girl is not engaged she may properly receive the attentions of as many men as will pay them to her. (2) It is not at all unusual for a sister to marry her dead sister's husband, and such marriages are quite as happy as any others.

Leota, Christopher, Ills.—It is proper for a lady and gentleman to shake hands when meeting, and a gentleman may assist a lady in removing her overshoes. Introduce the gentleman to the lady, always.

Swell, DeSoto, Ia.—It is a mean thing for a young man to let another girl answer a letter he has received from a lady, and as mean for her to answer it.

Queen of Hearts, Colorado Springs, Col.—By all means ask for an explanation. Never let a friendship be lost if explanation will save it.

Louella, Coffeetown, Ark.—Don't write to any young man unless you know him very well, and be careful what you write to any man. (2) Of two beaus drop the one you think the less of; either that or drop them both.

Merle, Bryan, Texas.—The best way to find out if a young man thinks a great deal of you, is to encourage the attention of some other young man. He cannot stand that very long.

Blue Eyes, Ringgold, La.—Put your poetry away for a year and in the mean time read all the good poetry you can find. Then read over your own and see the difference between then and now.

Bertha, Bolivar, Mo.—The only real language of the postage stamp is the profane language the cancelling clerk indulges in when you do not put it in the upper right hand corner. Always put it there.

Lonely Maid, Plattsburg.—You are worrying over something that nobody will ever know except yourself. Consider it as a mild little joke, just as other people do who are in the same fix, and you will be just as happy as if everything was as you wanted it. (2) Ask your druggist about depilatories.

Rebel, Pittsburg, Pa.—Break up your crowd. Eight of you are enough to scare away all the beaus in town.

Dew Drop, Modoc, Ills.—From eight to half-past ten o'clock is the proper duration of a social evening call for a man. (2) If you have money you may expect to be sought on account of it. (3) Sometimes a correspondence with an unknown person turns out well, but it is awfully risky. Don't do it.

B. B., Ballowe, Texas.—The Methodist Church by its rules does not allow dancing, but it does not always discipline its members who dance. (2) To change membership in churches you merely take a letter from that which you belong to to that which you wish to attach yourself to. (3) There is no market for poetry in this neighborhood.

Ruby, Harlemville, N. Y.—Write to any publisher in New York City, about book covers, enclosing stamp for reply.

Florence B., New York City.—Write the young man offering an explanation and if he declines to hear it, forget the whole thing.

Ette, Heather, Fla.—It is all right to accept presents from your cousin, but it isn't right to marry him. It is unlawful in most states.

Pauline, Jackson, Miss.—Young men should not call girls by their first names without a "Miss" before them, and girls shouldn't marry on short engagements.

Little Lew, Milwaukee, Wis.—Have an usher present the flowers to the graduate on the platform. (2) A Catholic and Protestant should not marry unless one or the other is willing to change churches. There is nothing wrong in that for there is but one Christ and one gospel, and they belong to all churches. Churches differ only in form, which is non-essential.

Circle, Chicago, Ills.—Don't marry for a while yet. So long as you are in doubt it is better to wait.

Paddie, Randall, Ills.—I do not think you committed any great impropriety in going with the young fellow to his home. Circumstances make a great difference in such matters.

Forget Me Not, Chicago, Ills.—The life of a nun is a hard one and should not be undertaken until one knows thoroughly what it means. Consult the priest in your neighborhood.

We Two, Franklin, Neb.—Stop loving the same man. It is silly for two girls to do that. Draw straws for him.

Jessamine, Long Prairie, Minn.—In view of the fact that you are in your father's store you might be allowed a little wider liberty in speaking to drummers without introduction, than otherwise, but be careful. (2) Don't give your card to a strange man you meet on a crowded train, unless he proves to you that he is entitled to your acquaintance. (3) You cannot translate and sell a foreign story if copyrighted. (4) If your friends knew the man who asked you to drive and to go to the opera it would be proper even on short acquaintance.

Trilby, Clinton, Iowa.—You are probably too indifferent and have a disagreeable and snippy manner that men don't like. Many young girls are that way at the beginning. Try to be agreeable.

Rosie W., Monongahela City, Pa.—Don't be in a hurry to marry without your parents' consent. Wait until you are twenty-one. You will never regret it.

Bonnylyn, Woodeaves, Pa.—Girls of sixteen will do very much better not to be having beaus for at least four or five years. This answers the questions of a half-dozen more cousins who have asked me.

A. M. M., Summerville, W. Va.—Rings are sometimes exchanged when the owners are not engaged. (2) There isn't room here to tell you all that would be suitable for a wedding dress. Consult your own taste and purse. Same for the second day dress. (3) Yes, a lady may give a man her picture, but she should know him well.

Hyacinth, Albion. Idaho.—Be careless of the young man's feelings and let him see by your regard for others that you do not care for him. Until he talks love to you you cannot do anything else.

Diana, Hesper, Miss.—Keep on declining to accept the young man's invitations and he will learn after awhile that you do not want to go with him and will quit. (2) Love is blind, and so long as you can see a deformity in the nice man's face, you do not love him. Take him as he is or let him go entirely.

Orange Blossom, New Pine Creek, Ore.—By no means go to your friends and tell them that you hear disagreeable things about them. Tell them only the pleasant things.

Leta and Lota, Litchfield, Ills.—It is difficult to suggest any line of work for you after you graduate. Usually girls who have to work, take anything they can get, and do better as they grow older and more experienced.

Priscilla, Pokagon, Mich.—You write a plain, good hand. Write to the principal of any Art School in Detroit about designing. Enclose postage.

Betsy, Corsicana, Texas.—It isn't wrong exactly for a girl to whistle and sing and be noisy about her own house, but it isn't as nice as if she were quieter. (2) Fifteen year old girls should wear dresses to shoe tops.

Lottie C., Pittsburg, Pa.—Under certain circumstances it is quite correct to ask a gentleman to be your escort to wherever you may want to go. (2) There is no reason why a lady should not conduct a dancing school.

Y., Charlottesville, Va.—I do not know of any one who buys old postage stamps. Consult some of the stamp dealers advertising in COMFORT.

Huldah, Bentley Springs, Md.—Seeing that you do not love either of the two men who love you, do not marry either. (2) Agate is the birth-stone for June.

Graduate, Batavia, N. Y.—Nothing can be prettier for a graduating gown than simple white, not low in the neck and not short in the sleeves. The "sweet girl graduate" isn't that when she appears in colors.

Black Eyes, Del Norte, Cal.—Don't speak to the young man till you are introduced to him. And don't worry about him. Let him worry about you.

Cousin Audrey, Akron, Ohio.—If there is no truth in the stories, you had better not do anything risky in order to prove they are false. Let the young man of bad reputation and good social position go his way and don't try to reform him by imperiling yourself and your happiness.

There is some mistake about the language of stamps, which cousins are sending to me for. Cousin Marie of Austin, Ills. please respond?

Gray Eyes, Elkton, Ky.—Ask your home physician for the address of one of the hospitals in Louisville, and write there for information concerning trained nurses and where to find a school of training. But do not do it, unless you are especially adapted to the work and are prepared to be on a strain night and day for the rest of your working life.

Wood Violet of Libertyville, Mo., informs Cousin Daisy of Newport, Ky., that she may find what she seeks by writing to John McAfee Sons, Parkville, Mo.

Now dears, all your questions are answered, either directly or through others, and I am going to say by, by, right quick, and send you all on your way rejoicing.

THE MAN OF THE HOUR.

The Remarkable Achievements of Prof. Weltmer, the Great Healer Are Causing Universal Astonishment.

PROF. WELTMER.

The Nineteenth Century has been correctly termed the most important in scientific advancement and mental development, but no new discovery in any line is at this time attracting such widespread attention as Prof. Weltmer's Method of Magnetic Healing. In fact, the phenomenal cures made by him during the past two years have been so remarkably astounding and wonderful as to demand the attention of scientific and medical men all over the world. His method of treatment banishes disease as if by magic. Hon. Press Irons, Mayor of Nevada, was afflicted with kidney and bladder troubles for ten years and could find no relief in the usual remedies. In one week he was completely restored by Prof. Weltmer. Not only does this remarkable man cure hundreds in his Infirmary, but he possesses the ability to cure at a distance, and all cures by this method are equally permanent. Mrs. Jennie L. Linch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles. In less than 30 days she was cured. Mrs. M. M. Walker, Poca, W. Va., suffered severely with female troubles and eczema and was entirely restored by Prof. Weltmer in a month. Thousands of other sufferers all over the land have been restored in the same manner. This is positively the only known cure for lost vitality and kindred ailments. Send for a copy of the Magnetic Journal a 40 page illustrated magazine, giving a long list of the most astounding cures ever performed. It is sent free.

TEACHES HIS ART TO OTHERS. Prof. Weltmer teaches his wonderful art to others, and it is the grandest and best paying profession of the age. Many of his students are making $10.00 to $50.00 per day. Taught by mail or personal instructions. Address, Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., The American School of Magnetic Healing.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

"Now is the winter of our discontent Made glorious summer;" and we are all in tune, after the long, dreary winter of storms, blizzards and intense cold which held the whole land, from Maine to Florida, in its icy thrall for so many months, to cry with real earnestness "Welcome, thrice welcome, June." As we throw ourselves under the shade of some big, leafy tree to read our June number of COMFORT we can hardly realize that so little time ago we were suffering from intense cold and storm; but we enjoy our summer weather all the more by contrast with the severity of the past winter.

Our first letter this month tells us a little of the early life of the eminent author who has furnished so much entertaining reading for our amusement in the long, warm summer days.

"The accompanying picture is an exact representation of the building in which Mark Twain, the celebrated humorist, was born. It is located in Florida, Mo., and although it is over half a century old, it will doubtless continue to stand for many years—an object of much curiosity and veneration to the admirers of the genius who was born there, and who, from such an humble birthplace, at last attained so high a position among the writers of the present day. Mark Twain was yet a small boy when the Clemens family moved from the old house and went to Hannibal, Mo., where Mr. Clemens, his father, engaged in the grocery business.

"The vicinity in which the great humorist passed his early life is well represented in his various literary productions; and it cannot be doubted but that his peculiar surroundings afforded him excellent opportunities to gather the fundamental incidents and characters, which, perhaps somewhat changed from the original to suit his own views or fancy, were afterwards described in such an interesting manner as to give the writer great fame, and cause his name to become well known in almost every family.

"For instance, an extensive cavern called the 'Hannibal Cave' is the one described in 'Tom Sawyer.' This wonderful production of nature, located about two miles below Hannibal and close to the Mississippi river, has ever been a great curiosity, and many people constantly visit it to witness the great variety of queer things in its lofty passages and rooms. The extreme limits of this cave have never been discovered; and the many mysterious channels, branching from the main passage, are well calculated to confuse any one who is not well acquainted with the cave.

"Again, an eccentric man named William Muldrow, who attempted to establish a city on the Mississippi a short distance above Hannibal, but whose plans came to naught, because, chiefly, the river in times of high water completely flooded the entire site of his town, is said to have been the original of Mark Twain's amusing character called Colonel Mulberry Sellers. Then, too, steamboats were numerous on the Mississippi river; Mark Twain travelled much on these boats and mingled freely with the boatmen. In fact, it is said that he learned to be a pilot under the instructions of an old river veteran. Hence it was that in his book concerning life on the Mississippi he was enabled to describe everything so well, and so true to nature.

"There are numerous aged men who claim to have known Mark Twain very well when he was a boy. These men tell many amusing stories concerning the humorist. If he really did have all the friends who claim to have been intimate with him, the number of his young companions was certainly very large; if all the anecdotes told of him are true, the experiences he underwent were many and various. There are many curiously carved walking canes in existence which their owners claim were cut from the trees which stood in front of the house where Mark Twain was born; but as the same number of trees are still standing which were there originally, these statements are certainly incorrect.

"The parents of Mark Twain, and two of his brothers and a sister, now lie buried in a cemetery near Hannibal; a short time ago the great writer had a monument erected at each grave."

ALFRED FISHER, Hannibal, Mo.

Our old friend, Alice Teasdall formerly of Texas, now writes me a nice letter from Trilla, Ill., to which place she has removed. We are glad to hear from her again.

Our cousin from the far west writes us a cool and refreshing letter on Alaska as a summer camping ground, which may induce some of you to turn your steps thitherward for your summer vacation trip. She says:

"Here is a view of Alaska for cousins who are not gold seekers. At the beginning of summer the new comer to Tacoma is divided in his mind between two vacation trips. Shall he spend a few weeks in the charming valleys about Mt. Tacoma or shall he journey by sea to the wonderful northern country of Alaska? It is the latter trip that I shall try to describe. The steamers which leave Tacoma for the north are large and comfortable and well suited for their battles with the ice, which they often encounter. It is not only to gold seekers that Alaska hath charms, for all nature lovers revel in the wonders and beauties of this younger child of our great republic.

"Steaming up the coast our craft makes its way through the innumerable islands which fringe the shore, to Fort Wrangel on the 'pan handle' of Alaska, and soon after leaving this we come in sight of the most wonderful of all the Alaskan views. It is the great Muir Glacier, flowing down from its lofty heights in the mountains and slowly dropping its great bergs into the sea. It is thus that icebergs are made. The great frozen river, like a swirling torrent caught in the midst of its leap and changed to glittering solid, creeps like a serpent around the mountains' peaks and plunges into the sea, where, the support of its bed being lost, great masses break off with a thunderous roar and float off with the tide to be gradually melted as they reach the warmer latitudes of the south.

"Our steamer skirts the edge of the glacier. Above us rises the pure white wall of solid ice hundreds of feet high, each crystal reflecting the sunlight and forming about itself a fringe of rainbow light. It is a time when one appreciates the insignificance of humanity. All this beauty is enhanced by the glory of the midnight sun which sweeps around the horizon, disappearing from view for only a few hours in the twenty-four, and leaving behind it a strange wierd glow which is neither day nor night. The aurora borealis is magnificent, and as its great streamers sweep up over the mountains in their majestic grandeur, one is awed into silence by the might of Nature.

ICE FLOES IN NORTHERN PACIFIC.

C. D. JONES, Tacoma, Washington.

Here is a handful of nice letters from some of the younger cousins, bright little masters and misses who by-and-by are going to take their places among the older and successful writers. The first one, Kermiller Moss of Clinton, Miss., says "I am nine years old. I take the COMFORT, and like very much to read the letters to Aunt Minerva. They are very interesting." Grace Futon of Paris, Pa., sends me a very well-written account of George Washington, and Anna H. Conyer, of Pleyto, Cal. writes interestingly of the lynx; but, you see, girls, what we want on our page is accounts of things which you have seen and know of yourselves, and not what you have read about. Do you see the difference? Elsie Smith of New Rochester, Ohio, has a long and carefully written description of volcanoes, which I cannot use for the very same reason. Too bad, isn't it! But read the next letter on "Swapping day in Estanaulee," and you will see what I mean, I am sure.

"On the first Monday of every third month Court convenes in Estanaulee (and other 'County seats' in Tennessee) when justice is dispensed, with more or less impartiality, to the denizens of town and country. Court days are also 'swapping days,' and the attractions of the temple of justice are feeble in comparison with those of the swapping ground, a vacant lot of an acre or more, furnished with rows of posts supplied with iron rings, to which the swapping stock is hitched.

"Crowds of men, white and black, on horses and mules, stream into town along the various highways, congregate at the jockey lot, and the fun commences. Let us saunter around among them to see what we shall see and hear. We can only do so in imagination, for ladies seldom come down town on Court days, although southern chivalry is out in full force among these rough-looking men and a lady, should she venture into the maze of stamping horses, braying mules and bantering men would be accorded unbounded respect. Such a motley crowd! Such an aggregation of bony, aged animals! Kipling's line—'A rag and a bone and a hank of hair' fully describes both saddle and steed in most cases, and a veterinary student could learn all there was to know about the bony structure of his future equine patients without the trouble of dissecting them.

"The swapping talk is carried on in quiet tones, and there is no bustle or confusion, except when some unhappy mule raises his shrill voice, not tempered by the softness of the climate, in loud remonstrance against his miserable lot in life; or when, from too close a proximity, two fractious Rosinantes fight a duel with their hind feet. Let us question this swapper in shirt-sleeves and jeans trousers stained with the red soil of iron-filled hills.

"'What can we buy a horse for?' we ask. He hastily slips a bottle in his pocket and turns to face us.

"'Well, fum ninety cents to two hundred dollars, mum—hold on thar, Bill—swap ye this hoss fur yer mule, and give ye a drink ter boot! Beg yer pardon, mum, thought yer was gone!'

"Another—'Here, you feller with the white filly! Trade yer anything I've got 'ceptin' my wife, ef yer'll boot me enough.'

"But the bottles have circulated until the swappers have become either over-jolly or quarrelsome, so we leave them to get rich off of each other in this one branch of business in which cheating is not only allowed by all but openly commended or made a matter of jest.

"To illustrate one rule of the swappers, I knew a girl who after her father's death carried on the home plantation a year or two. She decided to get rid of a superannuated horse on the farm, and bade one of her hired men take it to town on Court day and trade it off. But the poor faithful old horse was hardly out of sight when she repented of her ingratitude. When the man returned with a strange steed she ordered him to go back and bring home the old denizen of the family stables. He refused, saying: 'Can't do it, Miss—ef I wus to rue back they wouldn't never trade with me no more!'

"Imperiously she again commanded the man to bring back the old horse. He refused, saying all the rules of the swappers forbade such a proceeding. An ex-slave standing by, in whom the instinct of obedience was inborn, vaulted on the back of the unwelcome stranger, loped away and soon returned with his young mistress' faithful old horse which she never 'swapped' again."

ROSE S. BROWNE, Athens, Tenn.

Among western farmers the rabbit has become a nuisance, a thing to be despised and exterminated as rapidly as possible; but who can read the following story of mother love and mother courage, and not feel a thrill of admiration and respect for the brave little rabbit who so courageously fought for her little ones!

"The courage of a mother in defending her offspring is truly grand and wonderful. At this time fear is unknown, and the parent rushes on to what would seem to be certain destruction. In defense of her nest the sparrow will attack the hawk, and the puny wren will pounce upon the cat; but who would have thought that the rabbit—that timid, innocent little creature—would show fight under any circumstances! But so great is mother-love that even Bunny grows bold when her little ones are in danger.

"Three years ago, while driving across a tract of prairie in northwest Nebraska, I witnessed a scene that, to me, was indeed surprising. On a slight elevation about fifteen rods in front of me I saw a rabbit, a little 'cotton tail,' jumping about and acting so queerly that I determined to find out the cause of such odd performances.

"On going up nearer the spot I discovered that bunny was valiantly battling with a large 'bull snake.' In the grass close by was a form, or nest, of young rabbits which the snake was trying to reach in order to secure a dainty dinner. But an unexpected obstacle had appeared in the way, and his snakeship was baffled.

The rabbit would run up, and, seizing the snake with her teeth, she would endeavor to pick it up and shake it as a dog would have done; but her strength was not sufficient for this and she could only raise a part of it from the ground at one time. Then bunny would loosen her hold, and, jumping behind the snake, she would grasp it by the tail and drag it backwards away from the nest where her dear little ones were sleeping in fancied security. In this way she worried and punished the snake until it turned and ran off through the grass.

"When the battle was ended I was standing close by the nearly exhausted rabbit, but she seemed utterly indifferent to my presence. Blood was trickling from her ears and nose where the snake had bitten her, but as this snake is not poisonous I trust that this brave little rabbit is still running to and fro over that vast prairie.

Now let us take another summer trip to a "cool place."

"Soaring aloft to the dizzy altitude of 14,444 feet above sea-level, stands Mount Ranier, one of the snow-clad monarchs of the Cascade Range of the Pacific coast. This range stretches from the northern boundary of California to the southern boundary of British Columbia, a distance of six hundred miles, in which there are more great snow peaks than in almost any other mountain range of equal length in the world. Mounts Baker, Ranier, Adams, Jefferson, St. Helens, Hood, The Three Sisters, Thielson, Scott and Pitt are all crowned with eternal snows, and among them all Mount Ranier, for grandeur, altitude and isolation is conceded to be the 'King Peak.'

"This grand mountain is located in the heart of the Cascades, about seventy miles from the city of Tacoma, Washington, and is plainly visible for a radius of one hundred miles or more, rising from a mass of timber-clad mountains, and soaring upward until its glittering summit seems to pierce the very heavens. For many years it was considered impossible to reach its summit, but during the last ten years large numbers of persons have made the ascent. This is attended with great labor and peril. Yawning chasms, moraines, glaciers, beetling cliffs and precipices, and mountains of snow and ice must be encountered before the summit can be reached; but a magnificent view rewards the successful climber. Four great snow peaks, Mounts Baker, St. Helens, Adams and Hood, rear themselves around him, while a large number of streams find a source around the base of Mount Ranier, and flow in every direction.

"With the single exception of Mount Shasta, Mount Ranier is the loftiest snow peak on the Pacific Coast. Mount Shasta, according to accurate Government estimates, measuring only a few feet more than this."

MT. RANIER.

J. M. BALTIMORE, Spokane, Washington.

Hugh O. Bates, of Kearney, Neb., is another of the younger cousins who has written me a long letter on old Fort Kearney. Hugh has chosen a very interesting subject, but his letter is so long I could not use it and I found it impossible to condense it.

Lottie E. Held, of Princeton, Maine, writes a pleasant letter on Mammoth Cave, but as I have recently published a letter on this subject I could not use this.

Many thanks to Docia E. Bond of Wiggins, Miss., and Lawson Tatum, of Green Pond, Alabama, for letters received.

And now I have used all my space, so goodby for another month.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

THE STRAWBERRY is with those of us who live in New England and we herewith return thanks for same, which is much enjoyed by the large majority of mortals who have to eat to live.

Now there are shortcakes, and shortcakes, just as there are women and women—and while all may be good, they likewise may differ in glory, also in attractiveness.

Some people prefer a sweetened shortcake, similar to cake—but the sugar added to the strawberries is sweetness enough for most people and a paste made similar to that for cream of tartar biscuit is the regular old-fashioned shortcake. A good recipe for this is as follows:

Hull and wash two baskets of berries. Add to them a cup and a half of granulated sugar and set in a warm place.

Sift together a cup and a half of pastry flour, half a cup of cornstarch, half a teaspoon salt and four teapooniuls baking powder. (Of course level measurements are used, in all our recipes.) With the tips of the fingers work into the foregoing ingredients one-fourth cup butter; add gradually one cup milk and mix to a soft dough. Take out onto a floured board and knead lightly. Divide into two parts, pat and roll out each to fit a round baking pan. Bake in a quick oven about twenty minutes. Cut open each cake, spread with butter, and when it is melted, add the strawberries, which should be warm and slightly crushed. If a smaller shortcake is desired, make it of only one-half this recipe and of the rest make small biscuits. Garnish shortcake with whipped cream and some of the whole strawberries, if desired, or serve with it thick cream and sugar, which is much nicer, we think. Individual shortcakes are much easier to serve, and may be made in the form of a large biscuit, cut open and buttered and then garnished with the crushed and whole strawberries and whipped cream, as the large one is, if this is preferred. A large shortcake is an exceedingly awkward thing to serve, for the juice is very likely to accumulate as the pieces are cut, and overflow the plate, and in various ways embarrass the server.

Strawberry pies are delicious, also strawberry mousse, frappe, and ice. In making berry pies it is well not to use a top crust, but to bar across the filling with narrow strips of the paste, which makes a more attractive pie to look at, and there is no danger of a heavy top crust from the steam arising from the cooking of the berries between two crusts.

STRAWBERRY ICE CREAM.

Hull, wash and drain one quart berries and press through a sieve; add the juice of two oranges and one lemon, and one cup of sugar. Stir until sugar is dissolved, then freeze to a mush. Add one cup of thick cream beaten until stiff and then complete the freezing.

Cottage pudding with strawberry sauce is delicious. For the sauce take a basket of ripe berries and press them through a ricer. Boil together three-fourths of a cup of sugar and half cup of water ten minutes; cool and add the strawberry pulp.

Speaking of frappe, those who live in the country and each year make wine from grapes, will be glad to know of a good recipe for making grape juice frappe. For this, boil one quart of boiling water and two cups of sugar ten minutes. Strain into the can of a freezer, and when cold add a pint and a half of grape juice and the juice of two lemons. Pack in ice and salt, using equal portions of each. When the mixture is half frozen remove the dasher and set aside until time to serve. Serve in sherbet glasses.

We illustrate a canape of chicken and asparagus, and give some recipes for various kinds of canape.

thick, and cut off the crusts, shaping the soft part like a diamond; let stand in the oven until crisp, on a buttered tin. When cold, spread with butter and then with cold chicken, finely chopped or sliced; then add a thin slice of pickled tongue, and above this arrange four asparagus points, with mayonnaise dressing and capers. Thoroughly chill before serving.

CHEESE CANAPES.

Cut thinly-sliced bread into strips one inch wide and three inches long; fry a delicate brown in butter, grate cheese over them and add a little paprika. Put them into the oven and leave them until the cheese has melted. Serve hot.

OYSTER CANAPES.

Chop a dozen oysters and put them into a saucepan with a teaspoonful of finely-grated bread crumbs, a piece of butter the size of a walnut and a half cup of thick cream. Season with salt and pepper, and stir over a fire until it boils. Pour this mixture over thinly sliced buttered bread, placed on a hot platter.

ORANGE RINGS.

To three eggs slightly beaten add one-half cup sugar, five tablespoons melted butter and the grated rind of one orange. Add enough flour to make a soft dough. Roll out to one-half inch in thickness and cut in rings with a doughnut cutter and fry in deep fat; drain on brown paper and pour orange juice over the rings while hot.

If any housekeeper believes that the meat from which stock is made cannot be made into an appetizing dish, she should try the following method of preparing it: Cut the meat into suitable pieces, rejecting all fat and bone, but adding the gristle, which will be deliciously tender and cut into pieces about a half-inch in length. Fry in a spider with a tablespoonfuls of onion minced. Add six peppers, one clove, a tablespoonful of boiled ham, chopped fine; a bay leaf, a sprig of thyme, a blade of soup celery, cut fine, and two sprigs of parsley. When the butter is well browned add two tablespoonfuls of flour, and let it brown thoroughly. Add then a quart of canned tomatoes, and let the sauce simmer a little. Pour in a quart of rich jellied stock. Let the sauce boil slowly for half an hour, then strain through a puree sieve. Warm up a pint of the prepared meat in this sauce. Let the meat simmer about five minutes to become permeated with the flavor. The remainder of the tomato sauce may be set aside for any purpose needed; it will keep in a cold place for several weeks in winter.

Remains of a roast of lamb or mutton can be served in a variety of dainty ways. For instance, cut the cold meat in long, thin slices and heat them in a buttered baking dish with wine, preferably sherry, and a seasoning of salt, pepper and a little mustard. Serve very hot with a garnish of fried tomatoes or of mushrooms and a highly-seasoned tomato sauce. Or the slices may be well heated and served with a very rich white sauce and fried croutons of bread thickly spread with anchovy butter. Cold lamb chops are nice if trimmed, spread thickly with a puree of onions, dipped in egg and bread crumbs and fried; then garnished with parsley and served with tomato sauce.

RHEUMATISM IS DEAD!

Long Live OXIEN, the King of Remedies that Killed it.

No more infernal tortures, no more roastings of the flesh with red hot irons, no more lightning shocks from the electric battery or dosings with dangerous drugs.

RHEUMATISM HAS BEEN CONQUERED by Oxien the triumph of medicine, the Godsend of the age. Absolute cures are now certain, and Oxien is making them every day. In this connection

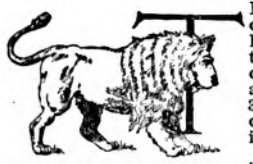
WE HAVE A WORD TO SAY.



Oxien was last year put to the test as a remedy for Rheumatism and it made a record of absolute cures in Acute Rheumatism, frequently called rheumatic fever, Pericarditis (inflammation of the investing membrane of the heart), Endocarditis (inflammation of the living membrane of the heart), subacute rheumatism, sometimes applied to the less severe attacks of the disease, chronic rheumatism, which swells and twists the joints and sciatica, or neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. In fact Oxien is guaranteed to cure Rheumatism in any form. Thousands jump for joy and many write as follows:

Received OXIEN O. K. Found it far superior to what you represent. Have tried everything I could hear of for rheumatism. For ten years I have been crippled up with this terrible disease. Laid in bed one whole year. Could not turn or feed myself and when I was able to walk on crutches (which I did for four years) was crooked and unable to straighten up, but Oxien did it and you can imagine how happy I am now. Yours sincerely, Geo. F. Lawton. Olympia, Wash., Feby. 9th, 1898.

FREE 200,000 BOXES OF RHEUMATISM CURE. FREE. This momentous offer we make in order to more thoroughly introduce this amazing rheumatism remedy in the United States and Canada. CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

THE moon completes another circuit around the heavens and overtakes the Sun, forming what is called the "New Moon," at about 24 minutes past 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 7th of July, Washington Time.

The conjunction occurs in the 8th house of the figure. The sign Scorpio is on the eastern horizon and Mars, its ruler, is in the 10th house. Mercury is in the 9th in trine with Herschel in the 1st house; Venus and Neptune are on the cusp of the 8th and in trine with Jupiter on the 12th, and Saturn is near the 2nd cusp just inside the 1st house.

Mars is "lord of the figure" and in the Midheaven, strong. This indicates predominance of a military spirit and that the war forces of the government shall overcome their enemies; though it likewise presages rebelliousness among the laboring mechanical classes, conducive to strikes and disorderly demonstrations in sections, which may call for the interposition of the military to suppress violence. There is danger of heavier fire losses than usual and harm to human beings in certain parts of the country, and it is apprehended that the city of Boston will be one among other localities likely to contribute more than her share to the aggregate of such harm. Mars so prominently placed presages some unusual criticism of executive authorities over what is styled the severity or rigidity of measures adopted in dealing with the enemies of the nation and with those engaged in resisting the constituted authorities. Some public meetings of over-zealous "political reformers" or mischievous mal-contents are indicated, condemning the government authorities and seeking to promote conflict and discord in Administration ranks.

The lunation occurring in the 8th house and in the ruling sign of New York City points to the serious misfortune, if nothing worse, to some person or persons prominent there in the political councils of the country; the dethroning of principal authorities in political circles or some marked diminution or restriction of power of such authorities.

Mercury in the 9th, having a favorable aspect with Herschel, indicates an extraordinary amount of foreign travel in July; unusual agitation in church affairs following close upon the heels of some adverse development or fatality high in church ranks; some great discovery in the scientific world, and advantages gained to the nation through diplomatic agencies in international or commercial matters.

All the malefics in the angles, involving Venus on the 8th house, renders more dangerous than usual all bilious disorders; quickening liver and bowel troubles and cautioning the sanitary authorities to guard vigilantly against fevers of typhoid or malarial and infectious character, which unless guarded against would become epidemic, especially in southern and southeastern regions. These conditions introduce complications of like nature into other physical disorders and our medical brethren should be watchful in such respects that serious mischief does not come. The days around the 17th of July caution our railroads against a dangerous liability to accidents on the rail and from fires and explosions. Persons born about the 8th of March or June, 12th of September, or 10th of December, of past years, should avoid traveling in the middle days of July or of exposing themselves in places of danger. The postal service of the country seems to suffer some detriment or has some embarrassment in this month. There will be some violent atmospheric phenomena, heavy lightning, and probably some earth tremors around the middle days of the month.

Mars in Virgo is bad for Turkey, Paris and the West Indies. Warlike activity, large fires and bad fevers are apprehended as a result in those regions. Spain contends against disorderly or rebellious demonstrations in the home dominions and her citizens in southern climes suffer unusual detriment from diseases of an infectious character.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JULY, 1899.

JULY 1—Saturday. Do not invest thy money in merchandise for trade and part with thy means very sparingly; put a bridle on thy tongue and do not engage in controversies or lawsuits, and in such matters already begun, adverse action and erroneous decisions are likely in this day; let the jurist distrust his judgment in the forenoon and postpone decisions until later in the month. To the fair sex in the pursuit of pleasure the influences are ominous, and many of them meet strange and unfortunate experiences and encounter mischievous conditions for health. Proprietors of theaters and places of amusement should beware of making engagements on this day and should in these passing days be on the alert against injury to their interests. Unusual money losses occur at this time through speculation in stocks. Look out for declines.

2—Sunday. A favorable Sabbath day, though inclining more to active recreation than to sober contemplation or reflection.

3—Monday. The morning hours are unusually depressing and not promising of advantage from enterprises then begun. Great care should be exercised in the use of the pen; sign no deeds or writings, and commercial men and bankers should give more than ordinary scrutiny to notes, checks and accounts; deception and errors are likely under prevailing conditions in monetary transactions; the afternoon and evening are by far the better parts of the day, especially for any of the recreative or pleasurable engagements, or literary work of the polite kind.

4—Tuesday. Independence Day. The early and late hours of this day are the poorest and in them it will be strange if some unusually violent and fatal catastrophe does not occur in our country; conditions are such that more than the usual harm from explosives, fires, or falling debris is apprehended; let all in charge of pyrotechnic exhibitions see that platforms are secure and that explosives are more carefully handled than usual. Combustion is quickened and fires are more fierce and destructive at such times. Let all precautions be taken, and in all cases of fire, let those in places of danger be careful of falling walls and not to jump or otherwise needlessly invite bodily injuries.

5—Wednesday. Defer any very important business until after the noon hour, especially if the same pertains to the agricultural pursuits or the dealings in or improvement of lands or houses; but bend every energy to the pursuit of business after the mid-day, dealing especially with persons in the elegant callings or those concerned with artistic or decorative wares or wearing apparel; musical merchandise, or dramatic appurtenances.

6—Thursday. One of the best days of the month; be up with the sun and urge business vigorously throughout the day; buy goods to sell again; deal with the banker and all persons of wealth and distinction. REGULUS advises his friends to push all honorable transactions to the utmost, which if now begun have more than the ordinary assurances of success, unless the individual nativity is radically very evil at this time.

7—Friday. Mixed conditions prevail here, such as give hinderances or dragging experiences in matters here inaugurated, though the day encourages vigorous prosecution of enterprises already in hand; have no dealings with usurers or money lenders and make no beginning in any venture that is not wholly open and above-board.

8—Saturday. As the sun leaves the eastern horizon, let all honorable pursuits be pushed with constantly increasing vigor, being watchful of thy means and seeing that generous impulses and mere gratifications of desire do not override good judgment in the afternoon; the forenoon is recommended for special efforts of a literary character and for commercial contracts and enterprises.

9—Sunday. The extemporaneous religious discourse of the day will be likely to disclose unusual eccentricity of ideas and strange peculiarities of expression; the tongue will be nimble and language flowery.

10—Monday. One of the excellent days of the month, which REGULUS recommends to his friends for the inauguration of their most important ventures in life, especially if they pertain to real estate matters; dealing with plumbers, plasterers, glaziers, gardeners, farmers, contractors and builders and the classes generally who are engaged in the laborious and dirty avocations; make purchases of goods for trade; open new stores, effect monetary engagements; solicit pecuniary benefits and deal with banks and wealthy persons.

11—Tuesday. Give preference to the first half of the day for the most vigorous prosecution of business, having financial dealings in regularly established business and with persons engaged in business pertaining to the gratifications and pleasures of life, wearing apparel and all furnishings and decorations; but have caution as the noon and afternoon hours are passing, avoiding important engagements with manufacturers, mechanics, and officers of large corporations or government authorities.

12—Wednesday. Evil. Avoid rashness of word or act and be not easily moved to wrath; the day is peculiarly dangerous for surgical operations, especially if performed upon the hands, arms, legs, or the abdominal regions; beware of fires, explosions, scalds and fractures. The middle days of this month are peculiarly mischievous in promoting bad fires and hurts by machinery or from falling walls or debris, and it is apprehended that the city of Boston may suffer particularly at such times more severely than at others from fires and accidents, and persons are cautioned to be unusually careful in the respects indicated while the middle days of the month are being passed, especially about the 12th, 17th to 20th, 25th and 26th. The 12th generally cannot be recommended for any important move of an initiative character.

13—Thursday. Use the early part of the day for asking favors of persons in authority and for crowding all the business engagements; less dependence can be placed upon the noon hours for any great undertaking.

14—Friday. Do not begin ventures concerned with fancy, artistic or decorative goods in the early hours of the day, but as the day advances enter with vigor upon thy several enterprises, initiating new work, making purchases for trade and forwarding all matters to the utmost; particular efforts may be directed towards real estate negotiations and the preparation and execution of writings pertaining to houses, mines, trust estates, and the estates of deceased persons.

15—Saturday. A very favorable day, inviting travel, business activity and enterprise. REGULUS urges this forenoon as a very favorable time for making new beginnings; the time is especially fortunate for the prosecution of literary and scientific pursuits; dealings with book publishers, printers and mathematicians; sign deeds, engage servants, remove and vigorously push all general business; seek no favor in the afternoon from thy superior.

16—Sunday. An excellent day for all the purposes for w ich it is appropriate. The day conduces to special enjoyment of the elegant in literature and art and renders courtesies between the sexes particularly agreeable.

17—Monday. This day is full of energy and enterprise and invites activity in nearly all the walks of life, but especially for machinists, engineers, mechanics, travelers, surgeons, electricians, military men, cutlers, and iron and brass workers; consult thy dentist and engage with manufacturers; exercise caution in handling combustibles and in the care of fire as the night hours advance, for the times are mischievous for fires and accidents.

18—Tuesday. The middle hours of this day are the best and should be improved for forwarding all the undertakings; do not seek advantages from dealings with very aged persons in the evening when no favor should be expected from railway officials.

19—Wednesday. The afternoon is the best part of this day, especially for the artistic and elegant pursuits, but the late hours are evil and caution thee not to change thy residence or travel unnecessarily; bear in mind the admonition to be watchful against fires, explosions, and all kinds of accidents coming from excitement or panic.

20—Thursday. Arise with the sun and give all thine energies to business; pursue literary avocations, travel, engage servants, do important correspondence, bargain for houses and lands and deal with the intellectual classes, booksellers, printers and publishers; deal with bankers, judges and persons of wealth and prominence; buy goods for trade, open new goods, and make beginnings generally.

21—Friday. Make no engagement towards wedlock nor expect much success in the elegant pursuits or from dealings in dry goods or fancy or ornamental wares; do not make beginnings in any matter of importance either in the literary pursuits or in real estate connections.

22—Saturday. Begin early and urge all the mechanical pursuits; experiment in chemistry; deal with military men, druggists, bakers, tailors, barbers, carpenters, machinists and engineers; the afternoon is mischievous in creating shrinkages of the purse and ought not to be taken for any financial negotiation nor for soliciting favors from persons of prominence in official life.

23—Sunday. There is but little of promise for this day, especially of assistance to the clergy, those connected with religion, or for matters of an ecclesiastical nature; have patience with thy surroundings in the morning. Choose the afternoon and evening for mental and literary efforts and for engaging the mind with literature of character and force.

24—Monday. Give preference to the early morning and late afternoon hours for transactions of a pecuniary character, but have care in the use of the pen during the middle hours of the day, being sure not to sign any agreement then as to books or publications, and careful not to make mistakes in estimates, accounts or correspondence.

25—Tuesday. The middle hours of the day are the best and are to be given preference for the general transactions of the day; bridle the tongue in the morning and avoid everything in the nature of a controversy; be watchful of the purse in the afternoon and evening when also thou shouldest shun all dealings concerned with houses and lands or with agricultural products or mining productions.

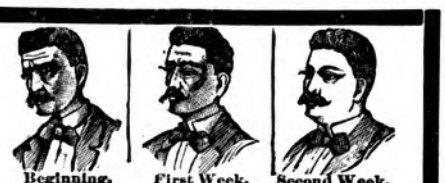
26—Wednesday. On this day do thou beware of litigation and contentions, for this is a day of strife and discord; be very careful if compelled to be about machinery or electrical apparatus and in the handling of chemicals, fire-arms, hot liquids and fire, especially during the forenoon hours; the afternoon is much to be preferred for all honorable engagements; for seeking promotion or advancement from principal officers in large corporations, public officers and from thine employer generally.

27—Thursday. A day of excellent promise, inviting travel, business activity and enterprise. REGULUS points to this as another of the best days in the month in which the beginning of new undertakings and important steps in general business should be taken; he urges his friends to waste none of these moments in idleness and pleasure, no matter what may be their business or occupation. The day is particularly favorable for commercial enterprises of consequence, for money negotiations and real estate dealings.

28—Friday. Be in no haste in the morning hours to engage in business of an elegant or artistic nature; do not make purchases of fancy or decorative goods, nor give attention to the polite studies; but give thy best energies to business of magnitude as the morning is passed; dealing with persons in the literary walks of life and with those in clerical pursuits; during the noon hours make engagements with publishers, printers, travelers, mathematicians, inventors and scientists.

29—Saturday. Apply not for favor to thy superior in employment nor to persons in official stations, and keep thy temper in the afternoon, when do not trade in metals or cattle.

30—Sunday. The evening hours are the best for the enjoyment of the elegant in literature and activity of the imagination; few conditions, however, conduce to religious fervor or moral advancement; the middle hours of the day are depressing and do not promise satisfactory experiences in any direction.



31—Monday. Have no dealings on this day with public officers or managing authorities in great corporations or upon large public works, nor solicit favor from railway officials or from persons of prominence noted for eccentricity of conduct or habit; do no correspondence of consequence nor sign any agreement in the nature of a bond. The time is peculiarly unfortunate for the majority of persons born about the 23rd of February, 24th of May, 27th of August, or 26th of November of past years, as they will seem to be strangely baffled in their efforts and hindered from realizing anticipations at this time and are likely to be just now in the midst of unusual mental anxieties, controversies or annoyances. Such persons should be very careful at this time about signing their names to writings and should not travel or change residence at this time.

IN OUR NEW COLONIES.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

CLEARLY few of us could have been prophets enough a year ago to have foretold that May 1st. would have been generally celebrated throughout the United States as a day commemorating the greatest naval victory of modern times; or that within a twelvemonth America would be a first-class power with possessions both in the East and West. And yet such is the fact and the grand wave of patriotic feeling which sweeps over the country was evinced by the general observance of a day, which is popularly called "Dewey day," but which legally has no existence as a holiday. Not even on "flag day" during the last Presidential campaign, when all parties vied with one another to give the greatest visible manifestation of patriotism, was there such a general display of "Old Glory."

While all praise is due to Admiral Dewey, it was also a day in which the heroism and gallantry of thousands of others were recognized. And right here COMFORT wishes to say that one of the most gentlemanly and impressive acts of the whole war was that of now Rear Admiral John Philip, then commanding the Texas, who, after our great victory at Santiago, assembled his officers and crew on deck and reverently declared in their presence his belief in Almighty God and requested his comrades to give silent thanks to Him for their preservation. This simple act of manly reverence will be remembered in history when events of much greater importance are forgotten, simply as an example of the manliness of thought and action of the American officer of to-day. Our initial shows this gallant and God-fearing commander.

In the midst of this national celebration has been one discordant note. A band of so-called "Anti-Imperialists" in Boston, headed by Senator Hoar and Edward Atkinson have carried on a war against the Government. The latter gentleman has been sending pamphlets to the army in the Philippines which are intended to foster sedition and mutiny. What these kid-gloved gentlemen want is not clear further than that they oppose "Imperialism" which so far as learned no one desires; but as we have repeatedly pointed out, while it is so easy always to destroy plans, it is not so easy to make them. COMFORT's readers will notice that with all the criticism interested parties have made about the policy of President McKinley in the Philippines, that none of them ever undertake to say what the United States shall do. Any policy of cowardice would raise a howl of indignation. COMFORT believes that our knowledge of the archipelago as yet is not sufficient to say what is the best thing to do.

Meanwhile President McKinley's commission is gathering facts and will undoubtedly render a report which will show what is best to be done. It is unfortunate that already many men are trying to make political capital out of this and other questions, which are of the most material interest to us as a nation. Our people should learn from the wise course of England that on all foreign questions we should stand together as one man for our country. It is already shown that the insurgents have deceived themselves by the noise of these people in America into supposing that there was a great division here; and, that they would be supported. This was what gave them courage to arm and rebel. Whether official action will be taken against Atkinson cannot be foretold; but in any other country than America he would have ornamented the interior of a military fortress weeks ago. So slight is the opposition of the people to the government that it seems probable that this act of sedition will be looked upon with good-natured contempt. The only bearing it can possibly have is its impression on the Filipinos.

The military operations in the Philippines during the past month have been remarkable as being one continued success for the American army. At times the Filipinos have fought desperately, but have been driven from every field and whatever successes they have met with have been of such minor and temporary character that they have scarcely been noted.

One of the most remarkable things in the whole conduct of the war has been the superiority evinced by the American volunteers and regulars when left to fight in their own way. Readers of history will remember that had Braddock listened to George Washington, his ambuscade and defeat would have been practically impossible, as Washington desired the English army to fight in small bodies as skirmishers, but Braddock obstinately believed that war must be carried out under certain rules and formation of the military. At a later date Lexington and Concord showed what Americans could do with the flower of the British army. Careful historians claim that had Washington himself not been filled with the same military spirit, the British army could have been beaten much earlier than it was, but that it took nearly four years of the War of the Revolution to discipline the Americans into machine soldiers and so that they did not want to fight in an independent manner. In the War of 1812 the most notable battle, that of New Orleans, was fought by riflemen who did their shooting without regard to military rule. The same fact showed in the Civil War; but as both sides were under West Point educated officers the armies were gradually made into disciplined forces.

In the present campaign the modern army tactics, which had seen the futility of large formations and columns of men advancing against modern weapons, have favored the American idea of fighting, and as will be seen in most of the accounts of the battles, the Americans advance in loose order with as little exposure as possible, and when ready rush the enemy with wild yells. This fighting has been something unheard of to the Filipinos who measured the white men from what they had seen of the Spaniards. It is probable that we shall never know the terrible slaughter that must have taken place among the Filipino soldiers. Photographs taken of the trenches and fields show their dead bodies in heaps, and they are undoubtedly learning a terrible lesson in this campaign. The whole advance this month has been a following up of the success at Malolos where it was expected that Aguinaldo would make a final stand, but which it will be remembered he deserted with hardly a blow after several defeats on the march toward that spot which was the insurgent capital.

The Filipino seat of Government was then removed to Calumpit, which is a large city a number of miles north of Malolos. The country is a hard one to fight in, and the roads very bad. There is a railroad running from Manila to Calumpit which crosses two rivers, the Bagbag and the Grande. Calumpit is situated on both sides of the Rio Grande. The papers have been full of the accounts of heroic adventures of our troops who steadily drove the Filipinos until they made their last stand in the tremendous fortifications thrown up on the further side of the Rio Grande at Calumpit. Here the works were so strong and the natural position was so impregnable that a handful of Americans could have held the position against an army, but in spite of this the Filipinos were driven from their forts with the loss of scarcely an American. The passage of this river is a remarkable military achievement, and General MacArthur, who commanded that part of the expedition, claims it as the greatest military event of the century and attributes its success to the daring skill and determination of Colonel Funston. It was undoubtedly the most daring enterprise of the campaign in the Philippines, and the flower of the insurgent army was driven back from the trenches and forced to flee northward toward the hills.

As this remarkable battle is but a type of many engagements that have taken place, and as it gives an idea of the individual bravery of the American soldiers, we will tell, in a few words, of the remarkable event.

On the night before the successful attempt, Colonel Funston with a small body of Americans determined to cross the Rio Grande. On the opposite side lay the whole of the insurgent army heavily intrenched and armed with artillery. It was necessary to cross. The first attempt at night was betrayed by the barking of dogs as Colonel Funston with fifteen men in the darkness crept across the dismantled iron bridge of the railroad. Colonel Funston with Corporal Furgeson crawled along the girders to within twenty feet of the opposite shore without the sentry, who was within ten feet of them, discovering their presence. Finding it impracticable to take any large body of men across this dismantled bridge, Colonel Funston called for one hundred and twenty men to cross the river a mile further down. It was in the moonlight that the barking of dogs betrayed this display of American activity. The insurgent army opened a heavy fire and they withdrew.

Undaunted by these two failures, Col. Funston persevered in the enterprise and succeeded in carrying the defences in one of the most daring and courageous achievements ever performed. The insurgents, numbering several thousand, occupied these earthworks on the bank of the river, and the bridge was so stripped of its flooring that it was impossible to cross it. In the morning following the night movement, Col. Funston decided to cross the stream in the face of the enemy's fire. With his 120 Kansans he went to a point in the river several hundred yards from the bridge, where two privates swam with a rope to the opposite shore, where they landed and attached the rope to a part of the insurgent trench. The rest of the Kansans kept up a fire upon the trench every time a man's head appeared, and so partly protected these daring soldiers with the rope. At the point where the two men landed were several insurgents, but as the privates began yelling they fled precipitately. As soon as the rope was tied, three rafts pushed into the stream under a heavy fire, and advanced upon the trenches driving the insurgents before them, although the Americans were for a time under the heavy fire of rifles and Maxim guns. Col. Funston running and shouting lead the charge, and the insurgent army broke into a perfect rout.

Col. Frederic Funston is a man who will be heard much of in the next few years. He has had more close shaves for life than any one in the American army in the same period of time. He first got a chance to show publicly the rare stuff that is in him in 1884, before he had finished his eighteenth year. His father was running for Congress in Southeastern Kansas on the republican ticket. The campaign was going against him when young Funston took a hand in the fight, audaciously addressing a meeting held for the democratic candidate, and by his exhibition of pluck, logic and wit converting foes into friends. His father won by the largest majority the district had ever given.

Funston was city editor of a paper in Fort Smith, Ark., three years later. It was a democratic sheet and Funston was a republican. There was not enough in the work to fill his yearning for excitement. The editor went away for a couple of days and left him in charge. Next day the paper appeared as a republican organ. The editor, summoned by telegraph, arrived in time to save his property from destruction at the hands of a mob. "I didn't like my job and I didn't like the town," said Funston when explaining his conduct to his friends, "but I thought that I might as well let them know that I had been there before I quit."

A trip on a government botanical expedition which took him through Death Valley and involved hardships that disabled more than half the members of the party next furnished Funston with the spice of danger which for him constitutes the chief charm of life. He was sent to Alaska on a collecting expedition. "There are a lot of people who know more about botany than 'Fred' Funston," said the head of the bureau who recommended him, "but nobody will come nearer getting what he goes after." After going through Chilcoot Pass alone in a blizzard, being capsized in a canoe in rapids that had claimed scores of victims, and enjoying many other hazardous adventures, Funston came back from Alaska with the finest collection of botanical specimens that ever came out of it.

Finding difficulty in gratifying his thirst for adventure at home he joined a filibustering expedition and landed in Cuba in August, 1896. Gomez was quick to recognize a hero and gave the young Kansan a prominent command and abundant opportunities to display his reckless courage. Wherever fighting was to be done Funston was in the thick of it. He handled dynamite guns and bombs as coolly as though they were fire extinguishers. In one battle he led a charge of five hundred mounted Cubans against twenty-five hundred Spanish infantry and was wounded three times. His horse was shot under him, but heedless of the hail of bullets around him he stripped the beast of saddle and bridle—for such accoutrements were very scarce in the Cuban army—and walked with them off the field. After engaging in twenty-two battles in Cuba he returned to New York—the ninety pounds that was left of him—on January 10, 1898, a physical wreck, and, as he himself thought, crippled for life. But when the war with Spain was declared he had so far recovered that he was able to offer his sword to the President, and was commissioned colonel of the Twentieth Kansas. How he has swam rivers under fire in the Philippines and done other valorous deeds has thrilled all Americans who have read of them. He is hardly thirty-three years old, and is as modest and unassuming in demeanor as he is full of grit and pluck. Since this article was written, President McKinley has promoted him to be a Brigadier General for bravery and courageous service.

"THROW that cane away!"

"Why?"

"Throw it away! Don't carry it a step with you!"

"What's got into you, girl?"

"That is the cane that Judge Baldwin carried when he was killed, down in the valley."

"Yes," returned the man slowly, and looking askance at the woman. "I picked it up when we found him."

"And it was his brother's Dr. Baldwin's before he was killed in the runaway."

"Perhaps. What of it? I believe you are superstitious."

"And old Daddy Sanders used to carry it before he was killed in the storm two summers ago."

"Well?"

"And his wife used to use it to help her lame foot before she fell over the cliff out on the farm. I can remember how she used to hobble around when I was a child. And they say a young surveyor who was killed by lightning under the tree in front of Sanders' gate, was holding it in his hand at the time."

The man grimaced, threw the cane back into the house, and strode out of the front gate towards the village. The morning sun was just peeping over the mountain and lighting up the valley below. The woman followed the man's retreating form, glanced on beyond him into the village, then on up the mountain, and finally down into the valley where the mists still floated.

With a sigh she retreated into the house, and a moment later might have been seen jostling the cane that caused the controversy out of the door, across the yard, and into the open road with the toe of her shoe.

They were brother and sister, this man and girl, children of Colonel Bristow, a Georgia statesman, prominent during the Rebellion, and who had owned at one time nearly the whole of the village and almost all that side of the mountain. When Colonel Bristow died, the son, Charles, and the daughter, Mary, fell heirs to a considerable patrimony, despite the fact that the Colonel had lost a great deal of property in later years. Both the children had been away to school, but had returned ultimately to live in the old house, though Charles was often away in the large cities for long intervals, and it was whispered, to no good purpose. At any rate, perhaps owing to bad management, the estate was now seriously encumbered.

About noon that same day, brother and sister were sitting on the veranda discussing the subject, and rather anxiously too, when a young man passing down the road entered the gate and politely asked for a drink. The Bristows, not wanting in Southern hospitality, offered him a seat and sent the servant for a pitcher of water. The stranger was a gentlemanly fellow who apparently knew a good deal of the world, and soon they were engaged in an easy conversation. His name proved to be Morton Hall, his occupation paymaster in a timber company, and his present object to pay off the men in one of their logging camps on the other side of the mountain. He said that he had got thus far with a considerable sum of money, when his horse had cast a shoe and gone lame, compelling him to stop for an hour or so. Mary Bristow expressed surprise that he should attempt to travel alone with money on his person, especially in view of the recent robbery and murder of Judge Baldwin on the road below. Her brother offered little or no comment, but studied the stranger furtively. For his part, Hall laughed and said that he so little thought of interference that he never even went armed.

They pressed him to stay to dinner, but he refused politely. They walked with him as far as the gate, and then, just as they were about to take leave, his eye fell on the cane lying by the path. He picked it up and examined it curiously. It was built up out of a stiff, straight ash shaft wrapped spirally with several strands of slender white rattan and one of soft greenish wood capped the handle end.

"Let me make you a present of that," said Bristow.

"Oh, I beg of you not to take it," exclaimed his sister impulsively.

Mr. Hall was about to hand it over with a gallant remark, when Bristow broke in roughly, "Don't let yourself be influenced by a fool girl's whims! It is only superstition."

"I beg pardon?"

"It is really a dangerous thing to own," persisted Mary. "The cane is older than I am. The story goes that it was made by a notorious Voodoo doctress years ago who put into it the fatal black Ippa vine, and then cursed it, so that it brings death to whoever owns it. The doctress herself was brought to her death by it! Every one who has owned it since has died a violent death."

Morton Hall laughed heartily. "Is that all?" he asked. "I am not in the least superstitious."

"I owned it for a week, and suppose I must look for trouble," said Bristow, sarcastically.

"I must thank you for the present," rejoined Hall. "The story adds to its value as a curiosity," and with a pleasant good-bye he lifted his hat and started toward the village.

During the meal the brother and sister sat silently. She sighed in a troubled way from time to time, and he looked glum and muttered to himself. After dinner he disappeared.

It was nearly six o'clock when Mary Bristow, sitting on the front veranda, saw Morton Hall ride past the house. He touched his hat and waved the cane in farewell.

"It grows dark suddenly in the valley," she called.

"Never fear," he answered. "Good-bye."

Two miles farther down the road the traveler drew his horse up sharply. The road was flanked on each side by a heavy growth of underbrush and it was almost dark now. "An uncanny place," he muttered. "By the description they gave me at the hotel, this must be the place where Judge What-you-call-him was murdered." The horse shied suddenly. Hall gripped the cane tighter and balanced it to see what sort of a weapon it might make. He glanced at it in surprise. It seemed to writhe in his hand. Then a figure stepped out of the underbrush and took deliberate aim at him with a rifle. The horse shied again and the rifle cracked. Morton Hall was a brave man but his next move surprised even himself. He found the would-be assassin within reach, and quickly raising the cane he brought it down with all his strength. The repeating rifle cracked again but the bullet sped wide.

Hall looked for his assailant. He had fallen under the blow. Quickly dismounting the paymaster knelt by him. The wooden head of the cane had struck the temple and raked downward through the face and jaw as though it had been of the hardest iron and propelled by an irresistible force.

Hall mounted his horse again determined not to venture farther that night. In a little while he had reached the village and given the alarm, and it took but a short time to get a crowd together to go to the place to which Hall guided them.—By this time it was quite dark, and no attempt was made to identify the dead man by those who bore him back,—and some time later a crowd of men burst into the hotel and laid the body of the highwayman on the floor in front of the roaring fire. An incredulous murmur was running continually over the villagers and many came and peeped at the white upturned face, and then tip-toed, away, whispering, "It is! It's Charlie Bristow!"

And then a slender young woman with a shawl over her head came, and the people drew back to make room. She looked, murmured, "I thought so, I thought so! O brother!" and pulled the shawl over her face and went away.

Then a strange thing happened. Morton Hall crossed the room toward the body of the man who had tried to murder him, carrying the fatal cane in his hand. Just as he passed in front of the fire-place the cane in some manner slipped between his legs and he tripped and plunged forward head first toward the raging flames. But a higher Power than the Voodoo had placed the blacksmith at the chimney corner, just where he could catch the falling man and save him.

The cane, however, flipped past, up-ended for an instant, and then toppled into the fire. There it lay for a moment while all gathered around to look. Next the strands began to unwind in the heat and the whole piece writhed and twisted. Its contortions grew wilder and even seemed to take on a human desperation. The very brands and blazing logs were stirred from their place and thrown out into the room where the red light fell on the face of the corpse. Then there was a sudden explosion that put out the fire, and the men groping their way out in terror were choked by a pungent smell of burning sulphur.

The accursed talisman of the Voodoo had done its worst, and was no more.

PHIL Buddington was station agent at Longview. He had held the position for two years and had won the respect and confidence of the company.

The station was one of the loneliest on the road—two miles from the village and a half mile from the nearest house. Buddington had hoped for a pleasanter and more lucrative position long before this, but other men seemed to have the faculty of stepping in just ahead of him, and he was almost ready to believe the complaint of many of the men on the road—that there was little chance of advancement for anyone, save those who had friends in the management of the road.

The office at Longview had been robbed and the company had lost something over a hundred dollars. Although Buddington was in no wise to blame, and the company looked at the matter in that light, Phil was inclined to view the loss too seriously, feeling worse over it than if the money had been his own.

The opportunity presented itself for Buddington to serve the company in a marked manner and he was not slow in responding.

One morning the express-messenger on the down-train handed Phil a letter from the division-superintendent, warning him to keep a sharp watch for two desperadoes who had robbed several of the road's offices. Further, he was informed that five hundred dollars reward was offered for the arrest of the men.

Buddington received the note early in the morning and all day his thoughts reverted to the matter. He wondered what he should do were the outlaws to surprise him, and with all his meditation, was quite unable to solve the perplexing problem. Of one thing he was sure, however—he would do his best to protect the interests of the company, and if possible do something toward bringing the men to justice.

Early in the afternoon snow began to fall and Phil busied himself earlier than usual caring for the switch-lights and attending to certain other duties, intending to leave as soon as the mail-train had passed.

At three o'clock the mail-carrier threw the pouch into the office, and was off again in a trice, his horse, cold and impatient, scarcely to be trusted alone for a moment.

Buddington was reading the superintendent's letter for the fourth time. A slight noise at the ticket-window caused him to glance up. For an instant his heart stood absolutely still.

There they stood, the two men whom the superintendent's letter had described, less than six feet away, as villainous-looking men as he had ever seen there on the border.

The office-door was closed and the new safe that the company had sent down two days previous was open; within the strong-box were six hundred dollars belonging to the company.

"Open the door, youngster," said one of the men, advancing to the door.

It would have been dangerous to have disobeyed, and Buddington did what most men would have done under the circumstances. He complied, but in doing so he passed the safe and adroitly closed the door, turning the combination. He had not yet mastered it, and the numbers were written upon a slip of paper. The instant he turned the combination, he threw the slip into the fire.

"Now open that safe, boy," said one of the men, with an oath, "we want the cash and are going to have it."

As yet, Buddington had planned nothing definite. His only thought in destroying the combination numbers was to gain time, meanwhile his wits might come to his assistance and suggest something.

"Certainly," replied Phil, his voice a trifle unsteady, "but you will have to be patient. The safe is a new one, and I have not yet learned the combination. I have it written upon a slip of paper and will look for it."

In one of those moments of keen perception the means of outwitting the men flashed upon him.

"Excuse me," said he, turning pleasantly to the men, "but not once have I failed to hang the mail-pouch on the crane yonder, in time for the mail-car to snatch it as it passes. The train is due in less than ten minutes; would you object to my attending to the pouch before looking farther?"

"Yes, we do object," roared one of the men, angrily.

"Hold on," said the other, speaking to his comrade, "the last train that stops here has gone. Perhaps the 'mail' would think it strange were there no pouch to-night. Let him attend to it."

"There is something in that," said the other, thoughtfully, "hang the pouch and be done with it, boy."

Buddington had at odd moments picked up a passable Spanish vocabulary. Near the border it was spoken freely, especially by the train crews that passed beyond the Mexican line and he had little trouble in conversing with any of the men on the road. Rapidly he wrote in Spanish upon a railroad tag.

"What's this?" demanded one of the men, glancing at the tag which Phil had tied to the mouth of the pouch.

"Merely a few words to facilitate the mail-clerk's work," replied Phil, "I take it you don't know much about the handling of Uncle Sam's mail. The clerks down here are about as familiar with Spanish as English."

Far down the road sounded the warning whistle of the express. Without waiting longer, hoping to escape embarrassing questions, Phil started out of the office, the men for an instant undecided what to do.

That moment of hesitation cost the outlaws their liberty, for Phil hurrying away, hung the pouch, and hardly had he returned to the office when the express whizzed past, the mail-car snatching the pouch from the crane.

Stop train below the cut. Am trying to hold two outlaws. Come by back-road, and well armed.
Buddington.

Instantly the clerk, who managed the iron arm for catching the pouch, noticed the unusual tag and took in the situation. The train was just rounding the curve in the road that hid the station from the approaching and departing trains; seizing the bell-rope, he gave the engineer the signal to stop the train.

"Be ready with your guns, boys," he cried, "Buddington at Longview is holding two robbers. See if your fire-arms are all right and follow me as soon as the train stops."

Meanwhile, Phil was ostensibly hunting for the combination-numbers, turning over this and that pile of papers in a vain attempt to locate the paper which had gone up in smoke a second before the men entered the office.

Phil thought that the trainmen were a long time in responding, and he wondered if the mail-clerk had noticed the tag at all.

"I believe the boy is playing it on us," said one of the men sniffing danger in the delay.

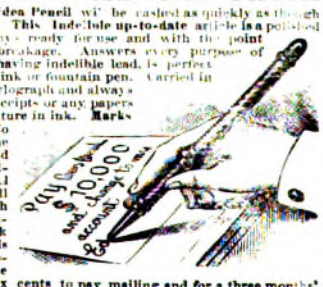
Hot Weather Dyspepsia

Thousands Suffer From It at This Season of the Year.

Hot weather dyspepsia may be recognized by the following symptoms: Depression of spirits, heaviness and pain in the stomach after meals, loss of flesh and appetite, no desire for food, bad taste in the mouth, especially in the morning, wind in stomach and bowels, irritable disposition, nervous weakness, weariness, costiveness, headache, palpitation, heartburn. It is a mistake to treat such troubles with "tonics," "blood purifiers," "cathartics," "pills," because the whole trouble is in the stomach. It is indigestion or dyspepsia and nothing else.

All these symptoms rapidly disappear when the stomach is relieved, strengthened and cleansed by Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. They should be taken after meals and a few carried in the pocket to be used whenever any pain or distress is felt in the stomach. They are prepared only for stomach troubles.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are indorsed by such physicians as Dr. Harlandson, Dr. Jennison, and Dr. Mayer, because they contain the natural digestive acids and fruit essences which when taken into the stomach cause the prompt digestion of the food before it has time to ferment and sour, which is the cause of the mischief.



Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are pleasant to take and unequaled for invalids, children and every person afflicted with imperfect digestion. It is safe to say they will cure any form of stomach trouble except cancer of the stomach.

Nearly all druggists sell Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, full sized packages at 50 cents. A book on stomach troubles and thousands of testimonials sent free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

that safe, and then——" he finished the sentence by cocking his revolver.

Buddington was now powerless to open the safe, had he so desired. Almost, he wished he had not destroyed the magic numbers and he wondered if he had not acted in a foolhardy manner. His fingers trembled as he continued the pretended search and his breath came in short gasps.

Buddington was standing so that he commanded a view of the rear door to the station, while the outlaws faced him. Suddenly he caught sight of the trainmen. They were running through the snow, two carrying rifles, the rest with a hand at the hip pocket.

The allotted three minutes were nearing an end and the man who held the cocked revolver, nervous and suspicious, watched the second-hand of the clock as it hastened on its third circuit. An instant later Phil saw three of the trainmen stealing into the station with their shoes off.

"I'll look here," said Buddington, throwing up the roll-top to the ticket-rack. Of course it stuck, and he slammed it down again, sending it up once more with a terrific bang.

Click! Click!

The two desperadoes leaped as though stung. They turned to find themselves peering into the muzzles of three gleaming revolvers, and three determined men commanded them to throw up their hands.

Those grim messengers of death were an unanswerable argument.

If looks could have annihilated Buddington, he would certainly have departed this life then and there.

The following week Buddington received a cheque from the company for five hundred dollars, all claim to which the trainmen waived. What pleased him most, however, was an accompanying note from the superintendent, informing him that a position awaited him as agent at one of the large offices of the company.

"A man who can keep cool and protect the interests of the company, when he might reasonably be expected to yield, we deem worthy of advancement," was the brief statement explaining the appointment.

TWO PRISONERS OF WAR.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MAX B. THRASHER.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

DURING the recent war with Spain the United States Government was sometimes harshly criticised for the publicity given to many of the plans of the campaign, and it was said that no secrets could be kept from the newspapers. Probably the critics never stopped to reflect that the very frankness with which much information was given out might be the surest method for diverting attention from what it was wished to keep secret. That this may have been true is to be seen from the following story, told here for the first time, of one of the most exciting incidents connected with the war.

On one of the largest of the islands in Boston harbor is a private school for boys. The name of the island is Bradford's, and the school has been in existence there for over half a century. Bradford's is only about a mile from the main land. To the north lies Castle Island, on which is built Fort Independence, a massive granite structure formidable enough to look at but wholly useless as a defense against the guns which have been cast since its prison-like galleries were constructed. Out beyond Castle Island is the main ship channel through which, narrow and crooked as it is, all of Boston's commerce must pass. Still farther to the east are Boston Light, Nix's Mate and the other islands of the harbor, over which the boys at Bradford's can sometimes catch the gleam of the light on Minot's Ledge.

One night in July of 1898 a sentinel was pacing back and forth upon the crest of a bluff on the western shore of Bradford's Island. The face of the bluff was steep and gravelly, and it descended abruptly to a narrow beach up which the waves were slowly climbing as the tide came in. A few rods back from the crest of the bluff was a little grove of oak trees, and half a dozen neat white tents under the trees marked the place where had been pitched the summer vacation camp which for several years has been one of the most popular features of the Bradford School.

Don Clayton had the watch from nine to one o'clock. The clocks in the Dorchester church spires over across the bay had just struck for midnight, and Don was thinking that in one more hour he could crawl into one of the tents which looked so inviting back there under the trees. Camp Phillips, named after one of the old Bradford boys who was now a soldier in Cuba, was laid out forty rods square. Following three sides of the square the picket line was inland, away from the edge of the bluff. Pacing up the third of these lines, his gun upon his shoulder, the sentinel approached the bluff again. Just ahead of him, across the water, the brilliant electric lights of the city shone through the night. Don wondered to himself just where on the "Heights" before him the cannon had been planted which drove the British out of Boston. The question was never settled in his mind, though, for when the picket came up to the bluff he saw that in his absence a boat had been drawn up on the beach and that five men were standing just beneath him. At first, thinking they were "clammies" Don started to warn them that this island was private property and that no one was allowed to land upon it without permission. Before he had shouted out this warning, though, Don saw something which caused him to draw back from the brow of the bluff and drop down flat in the grass to where he could crawl back again and just peer over the edge of the bank, down upon the beach, without danger of being discovered. The five men standing close beside the boat were talking excitedly, although too low for Don to hear what they said. Several times they pointed out upon the water in different directions, and it was when one of the men had done this that a long black cloak which he wore had slipped from his shoulders and given the picket on the bank above a chance to see that this man wore beneath the cloak the heavily gold-trimmed uniform of an army officer.

At first Don thought that after he had watched the men for a minute or two he would squirm back in the grass to where he could get to the tents without being seen and there wake up the instructor who was in charge. Later, though, he decided it was best to wait and watch the midnight visitors. Evidently they were no ordinary "bay prowlers," looking for a chance to steal fruit or chickens, and he made up his mind that if they put quietly out in their boat again he would not molest them nor arouse the camp. He wished he knew what they were talking about. Sometimes he could catch a word or two, but when he could he could not always understand, and he finally decided that not all of the men, at least, were speaking English. Anxious to hear better he crawled a little farther out upon the edge of the bluff.

It was an unfortunate move. Some of the boys only that afternoon had been burrowing into a stratum of gravel just there in search of the Indian arrow heads in which Bradford's Island abounds. The thin turf on the edge of the bank gave way. Don was too far over to save himself, and down he slid, along with little puffs of dust and an avalanche of gravel, until he landed on all fours right among the men.

Naturally the men jumped aside from this unexpected arrival, but before Don could get his breath enough to shout an alarm, or, in fact, to say anything, they were back by the boat again and two of them had seized him and bound a handkerchief about his mouth so tightly that he could not make the slightest noise. Then, while one of the two held him by the coat, the other brought a rope from the boat and tied hand and foot, when this was done laying him down like a bale of goods upon the sand.

By this time the other three men had come back to the boat, and an excited discussion took place over Don's body, although the men talked in whispers now for it was evident they feared there might be other eavesdroppers up in the darkness out of which the boy had been fired so unexpectedly at them. The talk lasted only a minute or two, though, for one of the men gave a sharp command, and pointed towards the water. The two men who had bound Don picked him up and laid him in the bottom of the boat. The men who had given the command, and the man in uniform, who had drawn his cloak about him again, seated themselves in the boat, the other man pushed off and taking the oars rowed out into the bay.

At first Don thought he had been kidnapped, but his common sense promptly told him that he was not a person of enough importance to have all this disturbance made over him, and he decided that he must have been brought along because his captors were afraid he would have given an alarm if they had left him behind. As the boat moved out farther from the shore the men began to speak again, this time not in whispers, since they were not afraid of being overheard. Imagine how Don, tied and gagged in the bottom of the boat, felt to hear the captain say:

"Better put a knife into him and throw him overboard. We've run risk enough already."

The man in the cloak made some reply which Don could not understand, but it was a relief to feel that he objected to the murderous proposition of the other. Don knew now that a part of the time the men had been speaking to each other in Spanish. His chum at Bradford's was the son of an American merchant in Havana, sent to the School when the Cuban trouble began, and Don had learned enough Spanish from him to be able, now that the men talked aloud, to guess their meaning.

"Hear me, and put him out of the way, and be safe."

The speaker had thin, hard lips and cruel eyes. Don could not see him from where he lay in the boat, but each time he spoke the boy thought of a long, wicked-looking knife which a sailor who had once come to Bradford's had brought with him, and which the boys said had once killed a man.

"Not unless we must," the man in the cloak replied. "I like the risk as little as you, but he is only a boy, and—I have a boy of my own, no older than he is, over in Madrid."

The man who seemed to be the captain began an angry reply, but he had spoken only a word or two when a low whistle sounded from the surface of the water not far away.

"Ah! There's the boat," he cried. "Good!"

The men rowing changed their course into the direction from which the whistle had been heard, and a few minutes later the row boat came alongside a clean-built steam yacht painted dead black and lying silent on the water, without a light in sight. Men leaning over the rail caught the side of the row boat with muffled boat hooks and held her while the five men who were in her climbed to the deck of the yacht. Don they left lying in the bottom of the row boat.

"What makes you so late?" the captain demanded angrily.

"We ran aground," the man who seemed to be in charge of the yacht replied.

"It was only the coming tide that got us off. It's no use trying to go around the island on that side. The channel is too narrow and the current too strong."

"Caramba!" cried the captain. "It is the main channel we must take then, and run our chances."

"General," he added, turning to the man in the cloak, whom the men on the yacht had greeted with very great respect, "we can spare no time. What shall we do with the boy?"

The officer looked down into the boat, where Don had stopped breathing to hear the answer.

"Cast off," he said, "and let the boat drift. We do not need her now. Somebody will pick him up to-morrow, but we shall be safe out of the way long before then."

Don felt the boat roll as the noiseless boat hooks pushed it outward. Then he heard the "swish" of the yacht's screw through the water, and then he was alone. The boat seemed very still, but he knew he must be drifting.

He wondered if the tide had turned and was bearing him out into the broad harbor where, in the darkness, he might at any moment be run down by a tug or a steamer. He fancied that through the water he could feel the throb of the propeller behind one of those great ocean liners he had so often watched go up and down the channel. He knew they always planned to go out on a high tide. Was he in the path of this one, and would she strike him? Perhaps the tide had not quite turned, though, and there might be wind enough to blow his boat ashore on some of the islands before she reached the channel. Even if the row boat beached herself he might lie in her for hours before any one would find him. He tried to get up, but his head and shoulders were thrust under one seat and his feet under another, and he could not stir.

When he stopped trying to get up, and was quiet again, he heard the steamer's propeller plainly. "Chug, chug, chug, chug." There was no help now. He would be run over and drowned, and no one would ever know what had become of him. He wished they wouldn't have to think at camp that he had deserted his post.

"Chug, chug, chug, chug." The sound was coming nearer. But was it an ocean steamer? No! The vibrations were too short and quick. Don recognized the sound now. It was the little naphtha launch of the floating life-saving station, out on its regular night patrol. The boys at Bradford's knew the station well, and had often seen the red and green lights of the launches go past in the darkness. If he could only make the crew hear him. He tried to shout, but could not.

The sound of the engine grew fainter. They had passed him, when:

"Boat ahoy, there," a voice sang out through the night.

A very little later and Don was raised up into the launch, unbound and ungagged, and plied with questions. The life-saving men find many strange derelicts but seldom one to cause them more surprise than to find a Bradford School boy as they found Don. Fortunately the captain of the station was himself on board the launch that night.

"I don't know just what's up," he said, when Don told his story. "I don't just see their game, but I think I know what to do."

Upon which the prow of the launch was turned in shore, to where the nearest telephone could be reached, and in a very few minutes the Commandant's office at the Charlestown Navy Yard, in which in those exciting days some one was on duty night and day, knew all that Don could tell.

Half an hour later the launch landed Don at the School wharf, where no one but the instructor in charge of Camp Phillips, and the Principal of the School, ever knew why he deserted from picket duty that night.

Some of the Boston papers the next day contained this paragraph:

"The fast gun-boat Machias came into the harbor this morning having in tow a rakish-looking black yacht. Both boats dropped anchors off the Navy Yard, but the authorities there decline to give any information as to what the strange boat may be. The Machias has been lying at anchor off the Navy Yard for several day past."

And that, until this story was written, was as near as the public ever came to knowing that a famous Spanish officer, captured in the Cuban War, was for a time confined a prisoner in Fort Independence, in Boston Harbor; that he escaped from there, and was recaptured.

All of which may show that the Government can keep secrets when it wishes to do so.

A. Ladd and His Wonderful Lamp.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY NICHOLAS LAMAR.

CONVICT Ladd stood at his bench putting the finishing touches on the carved top of a chair. Ladd was the genius of the prison, and the chair company, which had been so fortunate as to secure him on its contract, had given him the only work in the factory requiring any degree of skill. The big locker at the end of his bench was a perfect mine of interesting contrivances, but perhaps even more ingenious than all its contents was the lock that fastened its door, and which defied even the preternatural light-fingeredness of his fellows.

Suddenly the convict held up two fingers toward the guard on his raised platform at the center of the shop, indicating that he wanted to leave his place, and on receiving a signal of permission he started toward the supply room.

COMFORT, Augusta, Me.

At the bench next on the right a short, stubby fellow was at work, his cap pulled recklessly on sidewise, his face in a snarl, and his whole appearance bespeaking surly ill temper. As Ladd passed him this man thrust out one foot and tripped him up.

A wild burst of anger appeared in the convict's eyes. He turned like a tiger and with a storm of blows drove the other to the floor. But only for a moment. The short man sprang again and returned the assault. The neighboring prisoners began to cheer and cat-call. Guard Brice came running and tried to separate the fighters. As well might he have expostulated with two angry bulls. Then finding that they ignored him, he raised his mace and struck twice, each blow leaving an ugly scalp wound. The men fell apart and staggered to an upright position, blood running down over their faces. The guard called the patrol, and leaving him in charge of the shop, took the two men "front" himself.

In the afternoon of the same day Ladd was again at work before his bench. He was weak from the punishment the Deputy Warden had administered, and the stitched cut on his skull throbbed convulsively. From time to time he cast furtive glances at his neighbor, who had fared just as badly, and who threw his tools around and jerked at his work in a very speaking manner. It was only the fear of repeated punishment that kept them from flying at one another's throats.

"There comes Old Whiskers," muttered Ladd as an elderly man in a Prince Albert coat, a tile hat, and a pair of gold-bowed glasses, stepped into the shop. "Now I wonder what kind of trouble he'll get me into this time."

"Old Whiskers," in other words Col. Batten, the contractor who operated the chair factory exchanged a few words with the guard and foreman, and then began the round of the first floor, stopping at each bench and inspecting the work, and sometimes speaking to the workman. He reached Ladd, and after looking over his patterns, commented on the character of the wood in the pile of uncarved tops. The convict was just in the humor to ignore him, and so after looking his man over critically the Colonel turned again to the patterns. Then he dropped these and walked back to where the guard and foreman stood talking. He said something rather vehemently and with frequent glances in Ladd's direction. Ladd swore to himself. But in truth Col. Batten was speaking of the patterns and not of the prisoner at all.

Perhaps it was the throbbing wound in his scalp; perhaps the fever of the cut had permeated the skull and touched the brain. At any rate Ladd began to mutter to himself. Old Whiskers was always getting him into trouble, he said. And that guard, Brice, he would get even with him. Yes! He would get even with both of them. The fever grew. His glance sought the convict with whom he had fought in the morning. There was another; he would have a triple revenge.

His eye fell on the gas-holder shed, a large frame building next the chair factory. An idea struck him and he began to think it out. A good education had not been wasted on this man. He watched the clock narrowly, and just before the quitting bell struck he started for the supply room. From a case he took a brace-and-bit intended for drilling holes in iron; then he slipped out into the furnace room and hid behind the boilers. In a few minutes the men in the shop had finished washing, and were already on the road to supper in a lock-step column. As Ladd slipped out from his hiding-place, he dodged the engineer, and reached his bench where he began rapidly and skillfully to fashion an armful of wooden plugs. With his plugs and his drill he sallied boldly forth into the gathering dusk and reached the door of the gas-holder shed.

It was necessary to pick the lock, but in a moment that trivial obstacle was overcome and he stepped inside. Ladd was familiar with the place, having been a member of the force employed on the building when it was erected. The great circular tank filled the whole shed save for a narrow space around the circumference. The convict found a ladder and quickly mounted to the top where he fell instantly to work drilling a series of holes in the boiler iron plates.

It was slow work and already the evening count had showed the guards the existence of a "hide-out." The toiling convict heard the alarm, smiled grimly and worked the harder. As fast as the drill broke through and was withdrawn it was followed by a spurting jet of gas. Then one of the wooden plugs was inserted in the hole and pushed home. Finally the workman was satisfied; he surveyed his handiwork, and muttered, "Now for it! Tomorrow night that—who tripped me up, and I will have to work over time, and Brice will be there to watch us. Old Whiskers may not be there, but I'll catch all his machinery and stock, and that ought to break him up." Then he descended to the ground, put the ladder carefully away, and let himself out of the building as he had entered. He ran in and out between several of the buildings, so as not to be found in the part of the yard near the holder, and catching sight of the lights of a searching party, approached and gave himself up. And a little later he took his punishment, and offered no explanation.

The next evening after supper Guard Brice marched two prisoners from the dining-room back to the chair factory where a special piece of work would keep them far into the evening. Colonel Batten was already there, pottering around among the machinery and the various orders. Ladd glowered at him malevolently.

The men had their instructions and immediately set to work. Guard Brice settled himself in his chair nearby to enjoy a quiet smoke. The Colonel had retired into the foreman's private cubby-hole. An hour passed by with no interruption. Then Ladd dropped his tools.

"I want a couple of minutes off," he said.

"Another hide-out?" queried the guard, sarcastically.

"No. I want a drink."

"There's a bucket of water."

"It's stale."

"All right. But remember, if you set the whole force by the ears again you'll catch it worse than last night."

"Can I go?" persisted the prisoner, doggedly.

"I suppose so."

Ladd disappeared into the toilet room, noiselessly fastened the door with a wedge and then climbed out of the window and ran toward the gas-holder shed, drawing a sinister-looking object and a quantity of string from his pocket as he went. Having picked the lock he found his ladder and reached the top of the tank. The machine with the string attached to its trigger he fastened to a convenient manhole screw, and then stood over it thoughtfully.

"I have a hundred yards of string," he muttered. "If I pull it at that distance, I ought to be safe. There isn't any doubt that the flash will set off the gas. Let's see. About one part of gas to twenty parts of air will do the most damage, and it will take full ten minutes to let that much escape into the shed."

He shook out the string to see if it was free from tangle, caught it carefully in the fingers of one hand, and then began rapidly to knock the plugs from the holes he had drilled the preceding evening. The stench of the gas was over-powering. He held his breath.

Just as the last plug came away he caught sight of a moving light through one of the dirty windows. He stooped and saw that it was Guard Brice just come out of the chair shop with his lantern in his hand, who stood peering hesitatingly in all directions.

Ladd ducked involuntarily, and then nearly overcome by the volumes of gas began hurriedly grasping for the ladder. In the darkness he had lost his bearings, and groped in vain till he struck it suddenly and with such force that it fell over with a clatter. Brice heard the noise, uttered a shout, and came running. He jerked the door open and looked in. For an instant the convict was paralyzed, as his danger dawned upon him. Then he howled in terror:

"Don't come in here! Go 'way! Go 'way! Oh, you idiot! You fool! You——"

The very air itself flashed into light. There was a whoosh as of a mighty wind. The building rose bodily from the ground and fell apart, its walls flying in all directions. And it was done.

The immense boiler tank had been twisted half out of the well in which it floated, and the gas poured out of it. The windows of all the surrounding factories had disappeared, the weaker brick walls had been pushed down and just by the doorstep of the gas shed lay the body of a guard clutching an extinguished lantern in his relaxing grasp, while half under the overturned holder lay the body of a convict, blackened and steaming. And up above them streamed a pillar of fire, illuminating the heavens,—a signal lamp calling to all men within many miles to witness that Revenge, no matter how successful, is often a double-edged sword without hilt, which makes the intended victim and him who wields it to suffer as one.

A GRAFT ON THE FAMILY TREE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ELLEN FRIZELL WYCKOFF.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

THE house was old, old even for Rosquesbury. To-night the windows blazed with light. Bonfires burned at the corners of the crooked old streets that wound about it and rockets cut sharply through the heavy smoke that rose slowly from them.

Beneath the wide, old roof that spread above the twinkling windows, more than one of the signers of the Declaration of American Independence had feasted and slept in the grand old time of long ago. For the first owner of the place had been a patriot—a rich generous man, proud and brave. In the long picture gallery hung his portrait, the grim, powder-burnt face looking sternly down from its frame. And on the pages of the histories down in the library was his name in honorable place.

To-night the great grandson of the brave old man had called his friends together and the ancient walls rang with merrymaking.

This great grandson was a man worthy of his sire. Proudly he traced his lineage back to the stern old warrior who looked down from the gallery wall. There were those who declared that in Phillip Annesley the old man lived again.

But to-night when the great fires leaped and danced among the logs piled in the lanes and streets and the priceless chandeliers in the old halls and parlors twinkled and shone like new constellations and the music from many stringed instruments throbbed through the great rooms, nobody of all the gay company gave thought to a time so long gone. The present happiness was sufficient.

Ladies in quaint costumes and men in queer old clothes danced and chatted behind puzzling masks, for this was a masquerade, and from the ocean came a soft, caressing wind adding its sweetness to the beauty of it all.

In the yellow breeches and blue coat and diamond buckles of his illustrious ancestor, Phillip Annesley moved among his guests, and many a bright eye peeped slily out at him and many a white hand stayed his progress through the great rooms. He had made an oration in the town hall to-day that had brushed the ashes of indifference aside and set patriotism aglow. There was no mistaking the tall figure with its swinging walk and courteous bow and the kingly poise of the stately head. So he must stop and listen to low spoken words of praise, to pretty, daring compliments from lips that were safely hidden from his laughing blue eyes.

Upstairs, in a great luxurious chamber sat, even so late as this, a wee, faded old woman. A woman so pale and so still that but for the great shining eyes one might have thought her dead. On her lips was a calm, unchanging smile and in her eyes shone a soft light. The fire that burned even to-night in the quaintly tiled fireplace threw splashes of soft red light among the shadows that loved to cling to her. She was old—almost a hundred years old. Her shining eyes had looked into the faces of more than one of the men whose names were being honored to-night.

As the music grew louder she leaned forward, her hands catching at each other like fleshless claws.

"I did it, I wonder if death is waiting for me to repent? I did it and I am not yet sorry nor afraid. It was best; she was but a puny thing. The stock was too old. There's nothing in blood. It is the soul. Blood, forsooth. Men are made in moulds like diamonds or pearls or useless pebbles. Each independent of all others. But the soul—the thing that lives; it is that and place. I filled the place with the soul that I love. That is all. Filled it so long ago—so long ago that even Nature has forgotten and people trace resemblance to—to—It was at twelve o'clock on a night like this and the next night Alice died. No wonder, poor thing. But I am not sorry nor afraid. Is it you, Editha? Come." The last words were spoken in answer to a repeated knock at the door.

Through the soft, wavering firelight a girl came and stood beside the great cushioned chair.

"Shall I help you to bed, now, Miss Annesley?"

"To bed? To-night? Ah, no. Go away, child! The music, don't you hear it? That is rest for me. They are doing him honor. He is a king among them, my Phillip."

"How you love him!"

"Love him? I have loved him through three generations. And at last he loves me and is grateful. It is coming, the happiness, at last!"

"All this is too much for you. Shall I not close the doors and help you to bed?"

"No; not one door must you close. Not one. Open them all wide, wider. Let me hear more. It was this night sixty years ago and we were in Florence. I met Phillip there, but it was too late, too late! He painted my picture and—and—You know it, the one at the end of the gallery that is priceless because of the signature it bears. But ah, fame as well as love may come too late. He was dead when the world knew that a genius had lived! He painted my picture. I was like it sixty years ago in fair Florence and I—You are right Editha, the music has gone to my head. Send Hannah. At twelve come back to me. I want you, then."

The girl went reluctantly away. Not one of the fair faces behind the dainty masks down stairs was fairer than hers. Not a voice was softer, not a form more graceful. But she was not of these. Fate or chance or providence, or whatever unseen power it is that directs or decrees the destinies of mortals, had drifted her life alongside Miss Annesley's and she was giving her youth and strength for the food and shelter that would enable her to live on and grow old. Fifteen years ago Miss Annesley had gone on a journey and she had returned with the child, a little shy, quiet girl, with big brown eyes and close cut, reddish hair. And the child had made a place for herself. Not friend, not servant, not anything but Editha. And the years had crept past them, bringing the changes that make life.

Phillip had come home now and then from his wanderings and his heart had gone out to the wee, old woman in the great chamber. This living morsel of a long gone past. She told him stories of the men of long ago; and sometimes when he came after the shadows had gathered in the big chamber and the fire burned in the tiled fireplace, she told him of the great and wondrous love that had come into her life—a love that was immortal and could never die.

It was in Florence and she was young and the world was fair to see. She pointed to the walls where hung quaintly beautiful pictures of the old city, as the story went on; but there was a picture across which hung a curtain of priceless tapestry, and this he was never permitted to see. He knew that the curtain hid the face of her lover.

"Did he—die?" Phillip asked one night when the red firelight gathered about the wee witch-like figure bringing to it the soft curves of youth.

"Die? Almost everybody has died in a way, Phillip, but not really, you know. My lover is alive." The glow of the uncanny old eyes made Phillip turn from her.

"It was in Florence where my father was born. Was it then? So long ago?" he asked.

"It was then, but it is not so long when you've measured it step by step. Yes, it was then. It began and ended—no, it hasn't ended. Alice died. She was your grandmother. She knew, but she died. She was frail, that was why we went to Florence. And Horace was gone. Certainly she would have died any way. Sixty years ago! Leave me now, Phillip. My head is—yes, go now."

Only to-night before the gay company had gathered he had been with her. He had come in all the bravery of his great-grandfather's uniform, and she had fondled him with her claw-like fingers and watched him with her burning eyes.

His heart was full of pity for the wee, worn creature propped in the great chair.

"Not many women are so happy as I, Phillip. I've had my lover through three generations, in spite of all that came between." She said as if her bright eyes read the pity he could not conceal.

And Editha had come in, a quiet little body in her dark dress and white apron and cap. To Phillip she was a part of the room. One of the things that belonged to the old woman whose world it was, he had never seen her out of it, never thought of her except as he thought of the pictures and the shadows in the queer place. His visits home were short; his life belonged to the world beyond.

The house was athrob with music to-night when Editha closed Miss Annesley's door and walked down the corridor and past the door that shut off the stair leading to her own little room under the eaves, stopping at last before Miss Annesley's portrait at the end; evergreens and flowers were twisted about the grim old pictures of dead and gone Annesleys.

At the end of the gallery hung the picture of Miss Annesley and Editha stood entranced before it. She had been here not a few times and each time this picture had drawn her to it with an irresistible fascination. The pictured face was a marvel of beauty with its sweet brown eyes and smiling lips and its frame of softly parted red brown hair.

"Beautiful, beautiful. Is there a likeness even now? In my dreams of mother—surely I know the face. The hair, the eyes, the smiling lips—ah, the taunting memory that fades as I grasp it! It is like—"Paler, and with hands suddenly cold, she took from the bosom of her dress a little flat locket. Looking around cautiously she held it to her lips. "Only this once, Granny; nobody will ever know," she whispered, and then carefully opened the case. "It is like the one of the picture, and—and" Editha shivered and turned away.

"It is like the picture and I—yes, I am like it! Not a woman down there in the hall is prettier. Not one." She tiptoed part way down a broad stair and stood looking at the gay scene below her.

"I might do it, just this once. It is two long hours before twelve. Such long hours when the music is throbbing and the others are dancing. There are gowns, lovely gowns in those old trunks. I saw them when I went to get Phillip's costume. I might—"

The attic was not far from her own small corner in the great house. Bending over the deep cedar chest she drew out a package carefully done up in white linen. There was a faint perfume of lavender that was like a dim memory of long ago.

"This is it—the costume in the picture, the white and pink brocade! And the mitts and ribbons and laces and even the tiny white slippers—all but the locket." With flushed cheeks Editha gathered up the bundle and ran to her room. Before her small mirror she dressed herself and laughed aloud at the sound of the high heels of the tiny slippers on the bare floor.

It was easy to pull the soft red brown curls about her ears in the fashion of the picture and then she stood the living image of the portrait of Miss Annesley at the end of the gallery.

A piece of the filmy lace pulled across her flushed face answered for a mask, half revealing her happy eyes and smiling lips.

Again she crept down the gallery stairs. Slowly farther and farther, timidly at last for at the foot Phillip stood amid a group of laughing girls. One step more and unnoticed she had become one of them. Phillip's eyes found her, a demure little figure in a quaint rose-strewn gown.

"Where shall I seek a partner, fair ladies. Who is willing to dance with so clumsy a man as I on a night so warm? Will you?" He bowed low before Editha.

"Yes," she whispered, wondering if one of her shy little dreams had come true.

Editha had not been taught to dance, but she had watched the merrymakings here in the old hall many a time and her heart was light and the place athrob with music, and with Phillip's strong arms about her she floated through the sea of melody like a thistle down in a summer wind.

"You dance like a fairy," Phillip said.

"That is because I have never been taught to dance like a woman," she laughed.

"Have you not?"

She shook her head. He drew her into a pretty alcove where the sea breeze swayed the curtains softly.

"Won't you take that provoking bit of lace away? I'm sorely tormented because of it. I know you, and yet I do not. The gown, the poise of the head, a tone of the voice, the hair—who is it that you are like?"

She laughed softly—(there was no danger of being betrayed by a sound he had never heard in that dim chamber upstairs)—as he took off his mask and looked eagerly at her. How handsome he was and to talk like this to him, to Phillip!

"The delusion is a pleasant one," she said.

"Yes, the very roses in your gown, and your hands—do take the lace away." He leaned toward her in gentle pleading.

She raised the lace slightly and looked laughingly at him. "You wouldn't know me if the lace were quite gone," she said.

"But I want to, may I?" eagerly.

She shook her head. "Not possibly. I live so far, so immeasurably far from all this."

"Are you a little nun escaped from the convent over in the city, or a being from another world?" he asked. "Because——"

"That is it. I am a being from another world," she laughed.

"And it is in my dreams that I have seen you," he said.

"Really," with a pretty retrospective air," I do not recollect appearing in any of them."

"But would you know? Really, the people of your world are very provoking. And alas, that is true of the people in mine! I see the girl who wheedled me into asking for the next waltz looking this way. When I can get away from her, will you let me find you here?"

"But how shall I know?"

"The waltz you gave me—the waltz of waltzes it shall be to me forever—I will order that again. You know it? Ah, you remember too! When you hear it, come, please," and then he left her.

What a dream of beauty it was. An hour ago she watched the rockets from her dormer window, all alone. And now she was in the very heart of the merrymaking. She danced and chatted and laughed, a small bright thing with a film of rare old lace across her face and a quaint rose-strewn gown and small, high heeled slippers. And then she stole away to the alcove to wait—no, he was waiting for her!

"You have come. I have been watching you for hours and hours. What are you? A picture stepped from its frame, the spirit of some fair dead dame, a real flesh and blood girl?"

"All three," she laughed, and then her heart stood still. The clock on the stairs began to strike.

"It is twelve—the witches' hour. With the last stroke you must take the lace away!"

She knew the old hall. At the back of the alcove was a door. Could she reach it?

"A fan, please. On the table—get one for me." Slowly the heavy strokes beat through the music. When he brought the fan she was gone. On the rug lay a small white slipper. Laughing he tucked it in his pocket.

The house was dark. At the street corners the fires were dying sullenly. Now and then a lonely rocket swept the sky. Once in a while a loud explosion rent the silence. The Fourth was again a thing of the past.

With the little white slipper in his hand, Phillip stood in his room. "I wonder who she is? What a tiny foot. And the little hand—surely I do know her, and yet—Does a man in this prosaic age fall in love after such romantic fashion? And yet—yes, I want to find my little Cinderella. I must know her."

He turned the shoe over. Had he seen it before?

It was then that Hannah came to him with tidings that put the merrymaking out of his mind.

"Come, sir, come quick! Such a sight as is waiting. It is Miss Berta, sir, going, going at last!"

Silently he followed her.

In her chair sat the wee, worn old woman, her face ghastly, her eyes glazed, her hands clutching some yellowed papers.

"Phillip, I saw my spirit, to-night. I crept all alone to the stair and I looked down, crouching there, and I saw you and my spirit, and there was the light of love in your eyes, and now there is no longer any reason why this old body should live on. I am satisfied, but not sorry, Phillip, not sorry. Love has prevailed."

The voice ceased, the eyes closed, and that was all. Phillip raised the wee form and laid it tenderly down on the canopied bed. Hannah gathered up the papers and gave them to Editha. In the morning when a few friends were gathered in the old house she carried them to Phillip. He sat alone in one of the small parlors.

"I find here the carefully written directions for the funeral. The clothes she wore when her portrait was painted—do you know where they are?" He looked up and started slightly.

"Yes—I will bring them." She came back with the folded linen and laid it before him. "One—one shoe is gone," she said. "I have looked for it."

His face flushed a little and he looked up at her, a quiet little woman with a white ruffled cap pulled low over her hair and eyes.

"Have these been disturbed?" he asked.

She threw up her head and seemed taller. "Yes. I wore them last night and I lost one of the shoes. I am sorry."

He took the lost slipper from the pocket of his coat and laid it beside the other.

"I have found you," he said quietly. "This sad event will necessitate some change in your life," he began formally, but glancing at the ashamed, reddened face he went on hurriedly: "This is not a fitting season, but I shall not see you for awhile alone—not before I go away. And I want to say it all now, please. I love you. Will you give me the right to take care of you? After all, we know each other better than I thought. Will you be my wife, Editha?"

It was not the wooing she had dreamed of, but the voice was low and tender and the eyes full of entreaty. So, very softly, with the slippers and the rose-strewn gown between them she whispered:

"Yes."

Together they unfolded the papers—old love letters, some of them were—and then a little scarlet bound diary, dated sixty years ago. In gilt letters was the name, "Alice Annesley." Several leaves were tied together with a bit of faded ribbon. Phillip untied it and together they read:

"Florence, June 30th, 18—. Our baby is a girl. Horace will be disappointed; Berta is. The Brents have a fine boy born the same night as ours. They are miserably poor. Berta says Phillip is a genius, but she loves him still, in spite of the wife and boy! Poor Berta.

"July 5th. My head is queer. Berta says so. She dismissed the nurse and sat with me alone, last night. The new nurse tells me that my baby is a boy. I wish Horace was here. I am strangely weak. It is the Brent baby that is a girl and mine——"

Here the faint scrawl broke off.

"Brent?" Editha drew out the locket. "It is here, the name, you know, and I can show it to you now."

Phillip opened it. On one lid was engraved the names, Phillip Brent and Berta Annesley, and facing each other was two pictures. One like Miss Annesley's portrait and the other——

"It is yourself, Phillip," Editha whispered.

There was another paper in which was recorded the death of Phillip Brent and later the marriage of his daughter, Editha, to Arthur Wylde.

"That was my grandfather. When he and granny died Miss Annesley brought me here," Editha said wonderingly.

Later, they stood beside the wee, ghastly form in the rose-strewn gown.

"Did she know you, Editha?" Phillip asked.

"How can I tell? No, surely not, else—What does it all mean, Phillip? See, the curtain is gone from the picture, and it is—why, Phillip, it is like you! What does it all mean?"

"It means that there has been—a graft on the family tree," he said gravely, his eyes on the handsome picture.

"Has some wrong been done, Phillip? She was good to me."

He looked down into the troubled, puzzled face. "It can do no harm, now, Editha. Right and love have prevailed." And he kissed the frightened face tenderly.

"She said that last night. I don't understand, but oh, Phillip, I was so alone, and now I am so glad, so happy, for I love you."

The depth of the Atlantic Ocean between the Canary Islands and the West Indies is nearly 4 miles in places.

WHOLE suits are made of a kind of paper which resembles blotting paper—and the use of bath robes made of this material is quite the fad. The bather, on emerging from the water, simply gets into the paper garment and it at once absorbs the moisture. The process is said to be much warmer than the usual method, and a preventive of colds. Slippers are also made—and the use of one of these robes and a pair of slippers is not only agreeable and healthful, but a great time saver, as one is dry in one-quarter the time it takes to rub the body dry by means of a towel. They are especially desirable for children.

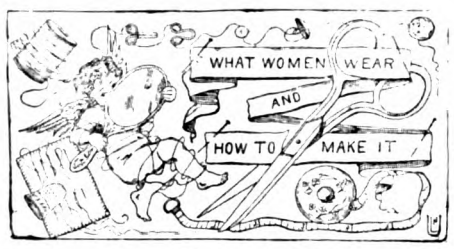
But remember that irregular or skipping beats are only one symptom, and in many cases are not found. Any of the following are just as positive and sure:—



Symptoms of Heart Trouble.

Fluttering, Palpitation, Shortness of Breath, Tenderness, Numbness or Pain in the Left Side, Arm or Under the Shoulder Blade; Fainting Spells, Dizziness, Hungry or Weak Spells; Spots Before the Eyes; Sudden Starting in Sleep, Dreaming, Nightmare, Choking Sensation in Throat; Oppressed Feeling in Chest; Cold Hands and Feet; Painful to Lie on Left Side; Drowsy, Swelling of the Feet or Ankles (one of the surest signs), Neuralgia Around the Heart. Persons having even one of these symptoms should not delay treatment a single day.

Medicine Free to All. If you have been treating yourself for stomach, lung, kidney or nervous disease, and have failed to find a cure, the chances are 9 in 10 that your trouble is in your heart. Hundreds of such cases are found every year. WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WONDERFULLY pretty mid-summer frock is made up of sheerest white organdie over an under slip of violet lawn, the white intersected to form squares, with inch-wide val. lace of a creamy tint. The soft, full bodice is caught about the waist by a crushed belt of rosy violet velvet, finished with a smart bow at the back, while a similar bow of velvet adorns the side of the lace stock. A number of fetching silk waists have sleeves and guimpe of lace, unlined, making them especially adapted to wear in hot weather. Nothing but praise is given the hats Dame Fashion has ordained shall be trimmed with naught save a bow of more or less large dimensions. The regular sailor shape is the style usually adopted for this mode of decoration and has the crown banded with a twist or high folds of the silk or velvet, (cut bias and hemmed on the edges) with the bow usually placed directly in front, though it sometimes graces the side of the hat. A dainty one I have in mind is a deep burnt yellow satin straw, with a perfectly straight sailor brim, and rather high crown, bearing a tight twist of rose pink velvet about it with an enormous bow of the same at the front, spread out quite flatly. Frequently a large buckle replaces the knot in the center of the bow, with good effect. The mob-cap is still a popular style of head-covering, and is, as a usual thing either all black, or all white; very becoming, too, are they to a round face, and worn alike by the maiden in her teens, and the young matron with her flock of little ones about her wearing the same style of hat. Those of white are built of thinnest silk mull, this material forming both the foundation and the bow of the hat, while around the edge is pleated a very full fall of silky lace. Sometimes a pink rose and a few leaves are tucked in among the folds at the side, adding a delicious touch of color.

Linen collars are not nearly so much in evidence among the most fetching girls this season, as are the neck fixings of ribbon, so much more comfortable and becoming, if carefully and properly adjusted. The ribbon is first fastened at one end, to the right side of the collar band, at the front, brought around the throat as tightly as can be borne, then once around again, the pointed end fastened with a fancy pin toward the left side of the front. When the back is fastened in place by means of a gold safety pin, you have a thoroughly up-to-date arrangement, and one that will stay in place, and as high about the neck as could be desired. Often the ribbon is fastened directly in front with a tiny bow and long ends reaching very nearly to the belt.

For wear with white shirt-waists ribbons having a white ground are the daintiest—white satin or taffeta polka-dotted with black or a color, are very much in vogue, as are also ribbons made to resemble ginghams in tiny checks. A very effective ribbon in taffeta has a ground-work of white with a rainbow effect of shades of blue running through the center and black stripes along the border. Handkerchief ties in fancy border or all-over Persian effects are very popular, though more appropriate for country wear than city, as they are more or less showy.

Smart indeed are the shirt-waists having yokes of white. It is the hall-mark of this season's goods, and yet it would be an easy matter to remodel last summer's waist into one of these nobby affairs. Entire white waists are made up in most dainty fashion with fronts of all-over embroidery in a small design. Talking of waists recalls to my mind a lovely model in white taffeta, completely covered with coarse white Brussels net, with across the front appliques of apple-green satin ribbon set on with a white cord.

OF SCARLET CHALLIE.

A pretty fad this summer is to have your pique skirt trimmed with three bands of wide insertion with the pique cut from beneath it and worn over a petticoat of blue, pink, green, or violet lawn, matching the shirt-waist in tone.

A most effective white organdie is built over sea-blue taffeta and trimmed most elaborately with row upon row of half-inch white satin ribbon set on as full as possible in slanting fashion, thus bringing the left side much higher than the right. The same mode of decoration elaborates the bodice. The parasol to match is white taffeta with frills of the ribbon set at even distances apart, and lined with sea-blue satin.

One of the prettiest bodices I have seen this season is built of white satin shrouded in white mousseline de soie set in tiny French tucks. An oddly shaped bertha of black lace with the pattern outlined in seed pearls and coral, has flaring epaulettes, and odd little cuffs at the elbow and wrist. A stock and belt of coral velvet are the finishing touches.

Never were prettier styles shown in children's frocks than now. A dainty little rig for a tiny miss of four or five summers is made of finest dimity in white, over a slip of rose-pink taffeta. The little Empire waist has a set of shirrings arranged below through each of which pink bebe ribbon is run, tying at the back in a series of little bows. The round neck is finished simply with a tiny frill and over the puff sleeves are airy wings of the dimity.

A sensible frock for a school girl is given here, made up in scarlet challie, the kilted skirt and blouse bordered with inch-wide black velvet ribbon; with it is worn guimpe and sleeves of tucked silk in scarlet, or if a more dressy effect is desired white taffeta or muslin may be substituted. The large brimmed hat of white Neapolitan is trimmed smartly with a big bow of black velvet ribbon.

WHAT HE CAUGHT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

WAS at Peacock's during the half hour of anticipation between the blowing of Gabriel's horn, which announced that supper was under way, and the clanging of a bell which would proclaim it was ready—and the Story Teller was absent.

"Wonder what's keeping him?" asked the fisherman of chronic failures, as he threw one leg to the veranda railing and then irritably crossed it with the other, "struck a school?"

"Nope; calmed off Cape Florida an' likely to pole in 'bout midnight," said the expert troller, philosophically. "I've been all through this no wind business from a b c to algebra. Has any one a yarn that is n't moss grown?"

No one answered. The fat man's legs followed the lead of the irritable fisherman and found their way to the veranda railing, and they were joined by others, singly and in pairs, and only differing in the method of crossing or in the angle of their inclination. At length a small, apologetical man at the far end of the line squeaked out:

"When I was down here last year, I went over to Cape Florida an' caught——"

"What?" cried the fat man, dropping his feet to the floor in resounding interrogation, "king fish? how many?"

"Blue fish, more likely," interrupted the expert troller with fierce eagerness. "Now I myself——"

"Pshaw! pshaw!" broke in a third impatiently, "he means a tarpon. They're not common on this coast, but we get 'em sometimes. Let me tell you a story."

"Oh tut! tut! tut tut! let the man finish his yarn," from three or four points at once.

"I—I—I was only about to say, gentlemen," deprecated the apologetic little man, trying to catch his breath, "that when I was down here last winter I went out to Cape Florida an' caught the worst cold I ever had in my life. I ain't quite got over it yet."

Slowly the legs went back to the railing, and "oh!" "h'm!" "bah!" "pugh!" ran down the line. Then from inside came the clanging of the supper bell, and in the change of the current of their meditation the little man was enabled to steal away unperceived.

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

I HAVE a number of hands to be read this month and will therefore postpone answering the questions which have been sent me about various phases of palmistry work.

"Florence" sends two impressions which were not properly secured with the fixative. The right hand is so blurred that it is impossible to make out the lines, but the left hand is very fair and indicates a person of refinement with artistic temperament, strong will, but somewhat lacking in tact. She will, however, make many friends and is a person of excellent judgment, strong likes and dislikes, and a faithful and true friend to others. She has not a very strong constitution although I do not see marks of any severe illness on this impression. She will need to be exceedingly careful of her health between fifty and sixty, but if she pulls through that period will live to be quite old. In matters of the heart she has seen very little trouble and married quite young to the person of her first real choice. I think a second marriage is indicated not far from the age of forty-five which will last throughout her life and will be very happy. Of course, in making this prediction I am guided only by the impression of the left hand which might be modified by the right. I have repeatedly urged that those who send impressions should take the proper precautions to have them prepared exactly right. If these directions are not followed and the impressions do not reach me in a perfect condition I do not hold myself responsible for mistakes in readings. I can only read what I see. "Florence" has a high, pure nature, rather religiously inclined, and she will always live up to her principles under whatever conditions she may be placed. She is of a quiet, home-loving disposition and will not do much traveling. A strong friendship formed in early youth has been drawn away from her although it follows her at some distance throughout her life. As I said before, she will need to be very careful of her health from fifty on, even at forty-five there is danger of trouble. On the whole her hand is very fortunate and indicates a peaceful, happy life.

"FLORENCE."

"Maple Leaf" has a hand indicating a nervous type of character. The fingers denote a philosophic nature and a mind that can turn itself to any occupation it pleases. The thumb denotes a strong will and great tact so that he will be able to get along famously with all sorts of people and will command the love and respect of those with whom he has to deal. He has an artistic nature, is fond of music and of various kinds of sports. He lacks the perseverance, however, that is necessary to make a great success in the business world. He has good ideas of what ought to be done but has not the courage to go ahead and do what he really thinks he might do, that is if he conceives of a great undertaking he does not quite dare on second thought to carry it out. This is a characteristic of his nature which he will need to overcome and he should cultivate self reliance and perseverance. He will not marry the first of his loves and in fact his marriage will not take place until he is thirty or over. He will be attractive to the opposite sex, having many qualities which they admire. He has a peculiar temperament, however, and he will always yield to matters of judgment rather than to matters of the heart, that is, his affections will be made to take a second place when his judgment or reason leads him in an opposite direction. He has some ambition in life which will be gratified. He is best adapted to an outdoor life which will give him a free and open business and a chance to travel a great deal. His life line is not so long as I could wish and I would advise him to be exceedingly careful of his health from the age of thirty on. He will, as I have indicated, travel a great deal and usually with success. I don't see any indications of wealth, however, and while he will probably make a comfortable living he will never be what is called a wealthy man. I fear he has an irritable temper which he should early learn to get under control if he would avoid trouble in the future. It will depend largely upon himself whether he sees much trouble or not. If he learns to control his temper, keep himself calm and collected in all emergencies, and to develop his perseverance and courage, he will make a success in life.

"MAPLE LEAF."

"Disheartened" sends a hand which indicates a nervous type of character, one who is restless and unhappy by nature. She has very strong characteristics of mind and her disposition leads her to magnify her troubles. If she would learn to develop self-confidence and repose of character and mind she would be happier. At the same time, she has always had much to contend against. There have always been many interferences with her happiness and progress in life from relatives or friends who have been opposed to her or a drag upon her at every step of her way. At the same time she has persevered and improved her condition, making a steady advance from the beginning. Although she feels disheartened at present she should take courage as the prospects ahead are much brighter. After the age of thirty she will have much less of this sort of opposition and will meet with much encouragement and many changes for the better. I should judge that her first marriage was not particularly happy, that perhaps some one has come between her and her husband or that some obstacle has come to mar their happiness. This will not last very long. She has been more troubled by the sorrows and perhaps the disgrace of others than the world generally knows; in fact the sorrows which she is bearing or has borne have been quite as much those of others as of her own but she should hold onto her courage and keep up a good heart for this is not going to last and the last half of her life is much the brighter half. I think she will live to a good old age; I see no signs of anything else. She is a very ambitious woman and some of her ambitions at least will be fulfilled although there will be much to go through with before the end is accomplished. In matters of the heart she is a little inclined to be fickle and perhaps this is one cause of her unhappiness. She is inclined to diseases of the chest and throat but these will not prove fatal. She is also inclined to melancholia and she broods over troubles, especially those of the affections. This tendency she ought to strive to overcome and to be more philosophical in her views of life. She will travel a great deal and will derive considerable enjoyment from that but, as I have already said, the better part of her life is the last half so that she should not be discouraged or disheartened. The indications are that she will not be wealthy during the latter part of her life, but she will have plenty during her old age or even from fifty onward, also she will have a reputation for brilliancy and executive ability. On the whole, in spite of her discouragement and despondency at times, much of which is due to her temperament, hers is a fortunate hand and she will see much good luck before she reaches the end of a long life.

"DISHEARTENED."

"Spring" sends excellent impressions of her hands which indicate a person of strong character, one who is fond of music, company, dancing and pleasure generally. Her hand is a very lucky one, showing good health and a long life which will end in distinction or in great riches. She will have a checkered career, however, and will meet with much opposition from friends between the ages of childhood and thirty years. She will see some trouble with all her changes, but will in the main be happy and successful. She will marry at about twenty-five and will make a successful and happy marriage. The marriage will not be approved by her friends and will probably be to a stranger, perhaps from the old world, but it will prove a happy union although attended by romantic circumstances. I think she will outlive this husband and although she will have several offers she will not be married a second time. She will be left with money which will make her contented in her old age. I think she has talents which would make her very successful if she were to go on the stage in some light soubrette part and although she would have some difficulties to overcome in the beginning, she would be successful and would become noted. I think she will do something of this sort as the signs all point to her making a reputation either as a public performer on the stage, or as a public singer. She will travel a great deal and her journeys will be successful. If she inclines to take up a public career her friends will oppose it, but she should persevere because she would be sure to succeed. She will never be destitute but on the contrary will become wealthy and will enjoy much distinction after middle life. She will live to be at least three score years and ten. On the whole hers is a very lucky hand.

WRITE FOR FREE TREATMENT FOR WEAK LUNGS

WEAK LUNGS are a menace to life that need attention.

Weak lungs are open to infection by the germs of pneumonia, bronchitis, asthma, consumption; and, once attacked, are very difficult of cure.

Weak lungs show their existence by great sensitiveness to cold, blue, cold hands and feet, constant catching of colds on the least exposure, chronic coughs, sore throat, catarrh, etc.

Strong lungs, which keep the blood well oxygenated and the blood well nourished and full of natural heat, prevent cold catching, and are proof against the attacks of germs.

The Slocum New System of Treatment builds up weak lungs. Cures all lung diseases. Destroys germs. Oxygenates the tissues. Restores strength to the weak frame. Drives away chronic coughs, colds, catarrhs, asthma, etc.

It can be depended upon to cure and to build up weak lungs.

It is the result of years of experience in a busy medical practice, and its beneficiaries are numbered by hundreds of thousands.

The above illustration shows the Doctor in his laboratory lecturing to medical men and students on the subject of his great discoveries.

To prove the value of his new system, he offers to send to all who write a Complete Free Course of Treatment, consisting of Four Preparations compounded in his laboratories according to his perfected formulæ, for the cure and prevention of all diseases of weak lungs, loss of flesh, etc.

Simply write, giving name and postoffice and express address, to Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine St., New York, stating that you saw this article in COMFORT, when the Four Free Preparations will be sent you.

A CLAM weighing two hundred and fifty pounds is somewhat of a novelty, yet in the South Pacific they do reach to this immense size. So solid are the shells that they can cut off a man's hand, if perchance it is thrust in when the shells are open; it has the habit of lying with its valves partly open, as though to trap anything that comes its way. On one occasion travelers saw an immense shark which was caught by the tail by one of these giant clams. There is also a case on record of a man being caught in a similar way. He was a collector and was searching for certain growth, and so had knives and tools with him. When he found himself trapped he tried with a knife to open the shells, or to make some impression on them, in spite of his great pain, but could not; the tide was rising and his only hope was that when the tide got high the clam would open its shells. This happened, though he had so long to wait that he had about decided to cut his hand off in order to free himself. As the shells parted he jerked out his hand, or what there was left of it, for it was crushed terribly, and made his way out of the water.

ONE MILLION TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND COPIES, Each and Every Issue,

Or Exceeding 15 Millions A Year.

This is the time of year when everything but a thermometer should quit work.

Will it be contradictory for our Peace Commissioners to celebrate the glorious Fourth? The principles then proclaimed are as true as they are old.

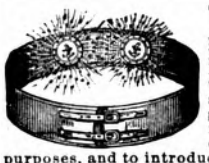
There will be thirty-one days of "Fourths" this year if Dewey will only give a few states the chance. He really needs to go from New York to San Francisco to see just how we feel about it.

The qualities of the real old-fashioned Fourth of July orations have been transferred to the after dinner speeches at the many dinners in honor of those who "won out" in the late unpleasantness.

The man who moves the thought, the tears, and the laughter of the world by his pen is today the real king. The pen may or may not be mightier than the sword, but in this hurried century it certainly is greater than the scepter. Even royalty itself comprehends this. During a recent illness of the Duke of York he was touched by the notice that the papers gave to his health and by the hundreds of inquiries that poured in. "One would almost think I were Kipling," said the young heir to England's throne.

Fashion condescended to smile upon the bicycle in the days when it was a hundred dollar fun producer. Now the wise ones tell us she has withdrawn her approval. One needs but to cast his eyes about, however, to see how small a part the ultra fashionable section of this world is. There are still two divisions of humanity; those who wheel and those who do not. "Tom" Reed indicated the relative proportion by the dry humor of his answer to an inquiring collegian. The academic youth had come on to Washington to turn the headlight of his trained observation upon the workings of our government. Fate gave him an opportunity to cross question the august Speaker of the House. "Mr. Reed, in your estimation what is the great question of the moment that is absorbing the attention of the mighty masses of the American people?" "Well," said Reed, "as near as I can judge it is dodging bicycles." The number of those who furnish the masses the opportunity to dodge does not decrease.

Women may become athletic and aggressively intellectual and a voter and any number of other things that were not her "forte" of yore. She can not altogether outgrow the hereditary influences of barbarism. The chains and fetters that she won in a far-away time yet survive. The dog whirls round and round before he lies down, with a survival of the instinct that once taught him to break down the bushes around his resting place. Woman has taken the badges of her servitude and wears them proudly as chains and bracelets. Those of 1899 are heavy and barbaric enough to be suggestive of the slavery of the man who pays for all this weight of gold and silver. Various articles have dangled from the end of the fashionable chain, from the four leaved clover to a tiny whistle of gold or silver. One of the latest fads is a tiny flat charm of crystal which opens to receive a national flower. One can imagine all sorts of sentimental interest pertaining to this "little faded flower," but it is style rather than sentiment that moves the modern summer girl.



The time is not far distant when the public will demand that the men and women in whose hands they place their children for a large part of the year shall be cultured men and women. Cultured not alone through the training by books and study but with the wider culture given by contact with people and by travel. The increase in the salaries of teachers makes this possible. No stronger indication of the purpose of teachers to avail themselves of these opportunities can be given than the largely increasing attendance upon the National Educational Association. This union of the leading educators of the United States is held this year in Los Angeles. During July thousands of teachers are making the trip across the continent. The stimulation that comes from travel and change means far more than the benefit to be derived from association with the people who have national reputations in this line of work. Summer is becoming emphatically the convention time. The average hustling American cannot yet quite reconcile his conscience to a vacation purely for the sake of a vacation, but when he can attend some meeting in a distant part of the country he falls a victim to the combination of work and play that a summer association presents.

July closes the door of 230,000 public schools in this great land. Fourteen million of children are turned out into the air and sunshine. There are lessons in the wide school of Nature for those who have learned the alphabet of observation. The attention given to Nature studies in the schools gives to children an added opportunity to enjoy "out of doors." The child who is intelligently interested in plant and insect life is never without a means of enjoyment and profit. Too much cannot be said in favor of this movement towards training the child to observe the life about him. During the summer months Cornell University offers free tuition to teachers in Nature study. How to observe and how to teach others to observe and read from the book of Nature is well worth spending time over. Mothers often find a means of amusing children in teaching them to collect specimens of all the common plants and flowers. A leaf and a flower placed between sheets of blotting paper and then pressed under a weight, will furnish a beautiful specimen. One child became intensely interested in such work. The common name of the specimen was given and then the place where it was found. Two or three lines of poetry descriptive of the flower were then added and the result was a pleasing record of a pleasant summer. It is a means of amusement but no less a means of education.

Students of sociology note with growing concern the movement of population toward the cities. They often fail to note the fact that the swing of the pendulum that way is followed by a corresponding swing in the direction of more interest in out-door life. The change in this direction is quite as marked as the tendency of population cityward. Out of door sports—golfing, bicycling, riding, driving and hunting, yachting, etc.—never received so much attention. This side is considered by the optimist. It cannot fail to be observed that the most enthusiastic devotees of "out of doors" are city people. The country people often know less of the charms of the "country that God made" than the man or woman whose time is largely spent in town. This follows the time-proved theory that we do not see nor appreciate the sights that are nearest to us. Nowhere is this more noticeable than on the farms. How many people who live on a farm ever spend a moment in the woods? The average woman upon a farm rarely leaves the house except to drive to town upon some errand. Her life is spent indoors far more than is the life of her city sister. The gospel of relaxation by contact with Nature needs no advocate in a city. Every flag stone and brick wall pleads its cause. The country woman shuts much out of her life that would add grace and beauty were it thoroughly understood. A hammock under the trees, a work table in some shady spot will change toil to pleasure. Half the farm houses of our land have no piazzas or arrangements for sitting out of doors. People do not see that this can bring something real and tangible in the way of pleasure into their lives. Live out of doors. What if you must work! Half of it can be done out of doors if it is once thought of. Set the tea table under the trees. Avail yourselves of the pleasure that lies all around you. Look at the panorama of hills, forests, meadows and streams, not with eyes that are unseeing through very familiarity but as one would look at a rare painting. New beauties will develop through attention. We are too busy, too much the creatures of habit and work to appreciate freely the grace that God has given to the world about us. Return to first conditions and live more under the open sky. Life was never meant to be circumscribed by four walls.

On July 4, 1826, Thomas Jefferson, the great founder of democracy breathed his last. Seventy-three years have passed since then and on July 4, 1899, the American nation may well pause and examine some of the most significant facts of our history. Within the year past we have acquired territory that enables us to say literally that the sun never sets upon the stars and stripes. With the great increase of territory it is natural to examine some of the conditions of our early territorial acquisitions. When Jefferson became President the United States extended westward to the Mississippi river and south to the Gulf of Mexico and Florida. Jefferson was a close constructionist, believing in limiting the powers of the Federal government to those expressly stated in the Constitution. The purchase of the vast territory of Louisiana burst upon the people like a thunder clap. It was patent that the Constitution gave no such power to the general government. Jefferson declared that he stretched his power until it cracked and advised an amendment to the Constitution, giving the power to purchase territory. Jefferson showed how the true statesman is not bound by any written or unwritten law when he declared, "I believe that the people wish this done." The will of the people was the foundation stone of Jefferson's principles. He read the Constitution as he believed the people would wish it interpreted, that is, with an idea of close limitation of the powers delegated to a general government, but when public policy seemed to demand a seeming contradiction of his principles he did not hesitate. This purchase and acquisition of territory furnished a precedent that has been followed. The purchase of Florida, the immense acquisition from the Mexican war, the Gadston purchase and the Alaska purchase comprise the land acquired by purchase. Texas and Hawaii were acquired by annexation. The Mexican cession like the Philippines was acquired by conquest, with the addition of a money consideration. Porto Rico alone was acquired entirely by conquest. It is interesting to remember the man who died nearly three-quarters of a century ago, but to whom we owe the precedent of the power of the United States to acquire territory.

Sheet Music Almost Given Away. The above song is one of the many pieces which have been selected and published by COMFORT from time to time in its different numbers. When the progressive idea of publishing each month a piece of most recent musical composition, was entered into, the editors had some misgivings as to whether the effort would be appreciated. The success of this new feature and the thousands of calls we had for more frequent publications caused us to look into the field. After some research we concluded that the price of popular sheet music was far too high; and, that with modern machinery and ideas, there was no good reason why the best sheet music should not be given to the public for very little money. Following this intention COMFORT has been for a long time sending to every part of the world sheet music of the highest character and best quality for a trifling amount, just about enough to pay postage. COMFORT absolutely guarantees the quality of the music and if you are not satisfied you can return it and receive back your money. It seems impossible that any lover of music could fail to appreciate the great saving by which such music as usually costs from 40 cents to 75 cents a piece, can be obtained in exactly the same form for a trifle. If you are interested look at the superb offer which COMFORT makes on another page. You have full guarantee for yourself and friends that we offer exactly what you will expect when you have finished the announcement. If you are buying sheet music it is the chance of a lifetime to obtain a great bargain.

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

IT seems strange that any bicycler should need to ask what the letters "L. A. W." stand for, yet I have inquiries occasionally. Nothing could be more significant of the phenomenal growth of cycling than its invasion into the ranks of many large and prominent organizations.

The League of American Wheelmen is naturally the official organization of the wheelmen and wheelwomen of the United States. All members of the League are over twenty-one years old. The great army of unconnected riders are almost to a unit in favor of anything that will tend to give to riders the rights that the L. A. W. is fighting for, so it will readily be seen that the L. A. W. is an important organization in our national life.

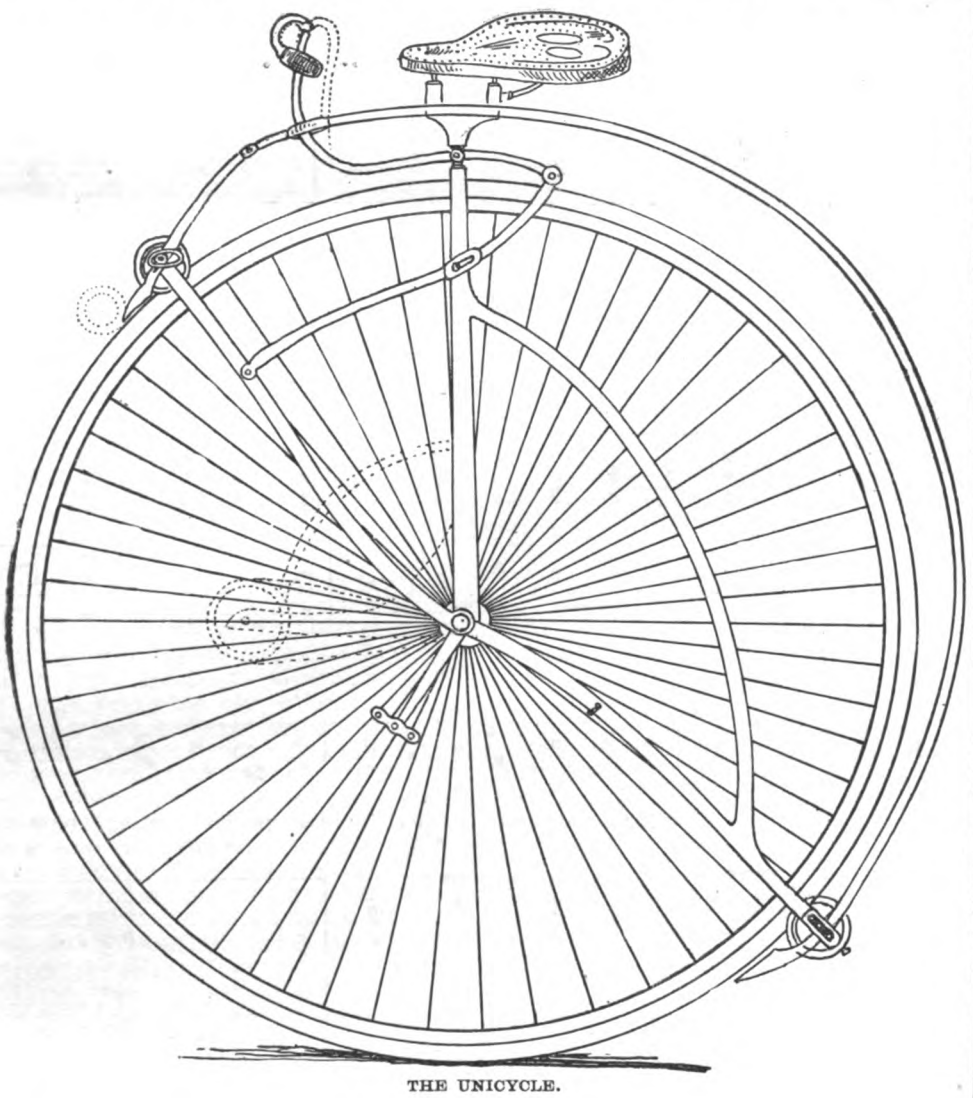
In the fall of 1888 there appeared in one of the leading bicycle salesrooms of New York a wheel that excited an equal amount of curiosity in the ranks of the riders of the high wheel, or ordinary. It was an English model of the safety, with 30-inch wheels, solid tires and a frame of the "boneshaker" variety.

In 1889 the American manufacturers succumbed to the demand for the low wheel and for two years the struggle for supremacy between the high and low wheels engaged the attention of the cycling fraternity. It was an unequal fight, however, and in 1892, upon the introduction of the cushion tires the ordinaries were relegated to the attics or sold to second-hand dealers at a heavy discount. The acme of cycling enjoyment was reached in 1893 when pneumatic tires were placed on the market.

From that time the advance of the sport was rapid. The number of riders within the boundaries of what is now greater New York was estimated at 10,000 in 1891, of which number about fifty were women who, mounted upon the old solid-tired wheels, braved the storm of adverse criticism and ridicule and prayed for the emancipation of short skirts and bloomers that has attended the progress of the up-to-date woman. To-day the number of riders in greater New York alone is estimated at 200,000, of which one-third are women, while there are at least two hundred bicycle dealers, and about one hundred more handle wheels as a side line. And this only one city, although a large one. What must we aggregate throughout the country! That the business has gone beyond the stage of a passing caprice and is firmly rooted among the leading industries of the country is evidenced by the high standing and business solidity of the firms handling bicycles. But a few years ago the wheels were handled almost exclusively by bicycle dealers while now you see wheels in the windows everywhere, and the evolution of the "chainless" has given us a new type and materially reduced the price of all bicycles. But we haven't reached the end yet. There are many practical bicycle experts who believe in the ultimate perfection of a unicycle which will make the "safety" of 1896 as much out of date as the high wheel of 1876 appears to be to-day. One of these inventive enthusiasts is Andrew Munro of New York, a mechanic, who has designed many accepted improvements in the bicycles of to-day. An illustration is given of his unicycle, which has been patented, and more than that ridden upon.

It consists of a single wheel with pneumatic tire, surmounted by a saddle which is adjusted to an upright forked rod from the axle; a peripheral frame extending from near the ground at the back to a short distance in front of the saddle, to which are attached two small flanged friction wheels having slotted bearings adjustable by thumb screws and which exert unequal pressures on the tire surface. The rear flanged wheel is adjustably adherent to the tire, first, to furnish a sustaining point of contact with the main wheel; second, to prevent the backward rotation of the peripheral frame when loaded, and, third, to insure the vertical position of the saddle support.

The front flanged wheel is free—first acting as a brake in connection with the lever, second acting as a flanged guide wheel, and third, acting as an adjunct to the steering gear.

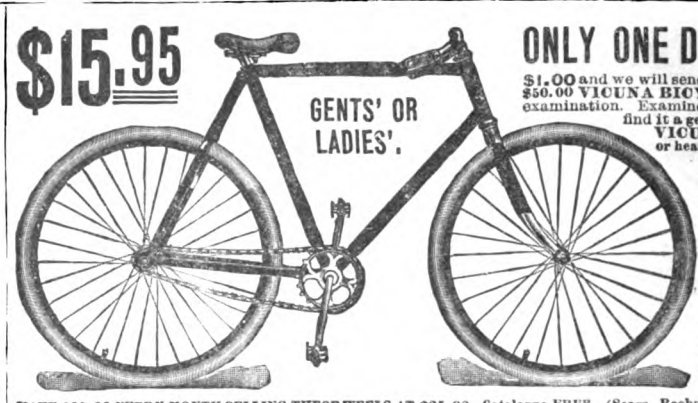


The adjustment of the saddle is arranged to permit the placing of the loadweight at a sufficient angle to the upright rod to counteract the forward gravitating movement acquired by the motion of the wheel as well as that due to frictional contact of the rear flanged wheel on the tire and any tendency to rotate the frame forward is immediately checked by the impact of the rear wheel on the tire as well as the depression of the forward wheel.

The peripheral rod is jointed to a small rod connecting with the forward flanged wheel. The object of this is to use the small wheel both as brake and steering gear. The handle bar is firmly attached to a curved rod which passes through a groove in the peripheral rod where it is secured by a bolt, and it extends some distance beyond, making a connection with a lateral rod which slides in a groove on an upright and serves to depress the forward lateral friction rod, causing the flanged wheel to press upon the tire surface as a brake.

The unicycle is operated both by pedals attached to an axle and by sprocket wheel and chain, a projection of the lateral rods serving as an attachment for the sprocket bearings. Its weight, eighteen pounds, is due to an increase of twelve inches in the diameter of the wheel and to the additional sprocket wheel and chain.

With the increased diameter and the sprocket attachment it is predicted that a revolution will be inaugurated in present racing records and extraordinary feats in fancy riding will be accomplished.



Anyway, it is plain that we have not reached the end of all inventions yet; and doubtless the Paris Exposition next year will show us many new things.

A VISITOR to the gulf coast makes the statement that the pearl crop is worth from one-quarter of a million to a million dollars every year. The largest pearl ever found here was sold to the Emperor of Austria for ten thousand dollars. La Paz is the headquarters of the pearl industry, and from there the pearls are sent to the great jewel markets of the world, which are in London and Paris. The demand for fine pearls is always far ahead of the supply.

A CARTRIDGE beer mug is one of the latest fads of a fashionable New York jeweler. The mugs are made from empty six-pound shells, which are a little more than three inches in diameter at the base and slightly narrower at the top. The opening is large enough to drink from comfortably. They are of brass, to stand the strain put upon them at the moment of explosion, and this brass will take a higher polish than the poorer grades of the metal, so that the mugs shine like gold. The only decoration is a silver band on the front, on which is engraved the history of the cartridge. Of course there are handles to these mugs.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

How fast the months fly by! And now it is July, and too hot to read even a little bit of moralizing, so I am going to have mercy on my readers and start directly on our letter-reading. The first letter which turns up comes from "Old Virginia," and takes us away back to the early days in the Colonies in its reminiscences of Williamsburg.

"Amongst the numerous objects of interest in Williamsburg, the old Colonial Capital of Virginia, may be reckoned William and Mary College, the oldest college in the United States except Harvard. Its charter dates back to 1693, and it was named in honor of William of Orange and his wife Mary, who were the reigning sovereigns of England at that time. It was the first college in this country to introduce the modern system of class lectures, and to have chairs of law, modern languages and history, also the first to announce the elective system of study, and to award medals, viz. the Botetourt medal. On its rolls we find the names of many distinguished professors and students, and amongst its Chancellors are the names of Washington, Tyler and other illustrious men. The Brafferton School, which used to be an adjunct to William and Mary College, was originally built and endowed for the purpose of educating Indian youth, but it proved unsuccessful, as the minds of the young Indians had a much stronger bent towards warfare and the chase than towards study.

COLLEGE OF WILLIAM AND MARY.

"The library of William and Mary College, which is adorned with many interesting portraits and relics of the past, contains about ten thousand volumes, some of them very valuable.

"It was in the old Williamsburg Capitol which was burned down in 1832, that Patrick Henry uttered his thrilling words, 'Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles First his Cromwell, and George the Third may profit by their example.' Here also the Speaker of the House told Washington that 'his modesty equalled his merit.'

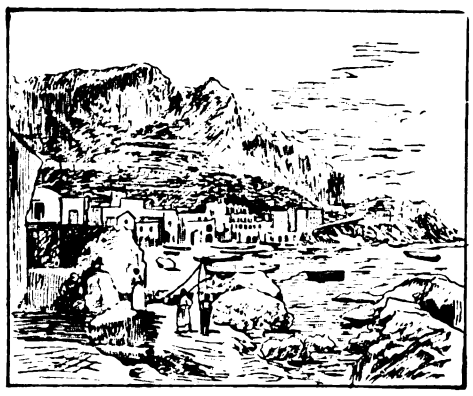
"Not far from here is the site of the old Raleigh Tavern which was destroyed by fire in 1860. Washington, Jefferson, Henry and other old heroes used to make this tavern their stopping place and rendezvous. Williamsburg claims the credit of having established the first asylum in this country exclusively for the insane. Special wards used to be set apart for the insane in other hospitals before separate asylums were provided for them.

"The first theatrical performance ever given in this country took place in Williamsburg. I have read in a number of the Virginia Gazette dated September 22, 1752, the following notice: 'On Friday last, the company of Comedians from England opened the theater in this city where The Merchant of Venice and The Anatomist were performed before a numerous and polite audience, with great applause.' I am not certain whether this was the first play ever performed there, but I am inclined to think it was."

M. W. EARLY, Wingina, Nelson Co., Va.

Now let us visit our southern friends again.

"Florida, the southernmost of the United States, first settled in 1565 at the place afterwards called St. Augustine, was discovered and explored by Ponce de Leon in 1512. He was hunting the fabled fountain of immortal youth. We are sorry that he did not explore the beautiful, sparkling Silver Spring, whose stream unites with the famous Ocklawaha, and afterwards with the St. Johns.



"Florida is rich in large deposits of phosphates, hence mining furnishes much occupation for her people. Fruit growing forms another of her great industries. Such fruits as the orange, guava, pineapple, pear, plum, and peach are mostly grown. There are large forests of beautiful trees, such as the oak, pine, maple, cedar, and many others, in which the mocking bird sings all winter long, for our climate is generally warm and pleasant all the year round." MARY F. HODGE, Heather, Fla.

Mary Simmons, of Connie, Chehalis Co., Wash., says: "I have taken COMFORT for ten years and I like it. I have some religious papers to give away if any of the cousins care for them."

Now let us, in imagination, take a sea voyage and land in beautiful Italy. We shall certainly enjoy the description of the cool "Blue Grotto," even if Naples and Sorrento do seem warm for the season.

"In Naples the regulation breakfast is coffee, with hot milk, three different kinds of bread, unsalted butter and honey. After breakfast we took a steamer for the Island of Capri. Here the boat waits while the passengers are taken in little skiffs into the Blue Grotto. This is a sort of watery cave in the rock. The entrance is very small and semicircular in shape. The passenger slides down in the boat under the board seats, and the boatman takes hold of the upper part of the rock, and as a big wave dashes in he ducks his body very cleverly back and pulls the boat in. Inside everything is blue, the most peculiar blue that you can imagine. The sunlight seems to come through from the bottom of the water, and a boy in swimming is reflected on the wall.

"After visiting the Grotto we went to the town of Capri, where the steamer remains while we lunch and drive through the town and up the mountain side, which gives a fine view of the bay and the surrounding country. The roads here are all made of smooth stone and are very good. Along the wayside, in apparently the wildest places, are niches hewn out of the solid rock, in each of which is the marble statue of some saint which the people worship by laying flowers and other offerings at their feet. Above the heads of the statues are lamps which are lighted at night. All these, with beautiful fig, orange and lemon trees growing in abundance, tend to make the scene picturesque, while in the distance are plainly to be seen the ruins of the castle of Tiberius, which is at the eastern extremity of the island.

CAPRI, ITALY.

"Leaving Capri, we took the steamer to Sorrento. There are about a dozen hotels here and each one sends off small boats to meet the steamer; the greatest confusion prevails, and you are relieved when you are safely landed. This place is celebrated as the birthplace of the poet Tasso, and you find him everywhere—from the butter pat to the marble bust.

"Our hotel had formerly been an old castle, built on the edge of the rocks overhanging the bay; the other three sides encircling the most ideal court and gardens imaginable. We walked through tunnels hewn out of the solid rock by the Romans centuries ago; emerging from the darkness into sunlight and flowers, only to make another turn into another tunnel, then up broad marble steps through odd passages until we reached the sixth story where were our rooms. The Garden of Eden could not have been lovelier than this one in Sorrento. We wandered along mossy paths, amid stately palms and magnificent lemon trees with long, glossy leaves and yellow fruit, and among rose trees which were in the full beauty of their bloom. Suddenly we would come upon a rustic arbor, a marble vase or a statue, or perhaps, ascending marble steps overhung with orange blossoms come to a court in which was a party of young men and women dressed in bright-colored costumes dancing the national dance, the Tarantell. This dance belongs to Sorrento, and is a sort of quadrille, the girls using tambourines and the men bones. They dance about and around each other, with the most charming bows, poises, and grace imaginable. It is all careless, bright, and apparently enjoyable, and the picture is an ideal one."

BELLE T. OSBORNE, Atlantic, Iowa.

I have read with interest S. H. Carnahan's letter on "The Schools of the Prophets," but do not find it quite suited to our page.

I also thank Bert B. Cook for the story he sent me, but as my page is not for stories I cannot use it.

We certainly have the advantage of most travelers, for we can transfer ourselves from Sorrento to the St. Lawrence River at a moment's warning, and we shall doubtless enjoy the change from foreign lands to our own country. I, for one, am always ready to sing "Home, Sweet Home."

"Let me tell your readers of our Thousand Isles of the river St. Lawrence. 'Thousand Isles' they are called, though river guides say that there are more than double that number now, owing to the low water in the river. I live upon one of these islands—Grindstone—so called by the Indians on account of the excellent quality of the stone found here for use as grindstones. This stone is red granite, and is said to be the finest in the world. It cannot be excelled for monumental purposes or for street paving. The quarries have been worked extensively in the past, but are now lying idle owing to the inability of the Company to compete with the Asphalt Company. Still, we feel confident that people will soon learn that granite, although expensive at first, is far more durable for street paving than asphalt, and so our quarries will again be worked.

"We have a road through the center of our island called the 'Base-Line.' This was formerly the boundary line between the United States and Canada. In later years a new survey was made and a boundary line was placed on our northern coast. In the Patriot War of 1837-38 this island was made the hiding place of a number of leaders of the rebellion. In later years their secret hiding place was revealed.

PULLMAN ISLAND, THOUSAND ISLES.

"As every one knows, this river is one of the most famous summer resorts in the world, and bears the name of the 'Rhine of America.' With its beautiful scenery and excellent fishing the river islands have nearly all been purchased and improved. Wealth has been lavishly expended on them. One of the many lovely homes here is 'Castle Rest,' the summer home of the late palace car king, Mr. Pullman. The castle and towers are built of stone in the rough, just as it was gathered up from the earth, in every conceivable shape, and laid by the masons without any use of a hammer in the construction. A more irregular surface can scarcely be conceived, but though very odd it is also very beautiful. Some have taken small rocks projecting from the water, encircled them with a sea-wall of rough stone and filled the space so enclosed with earth on which they have planted trees.

"Last year the State Department, finding that the islands were all passing into private hands, leaving none for use as public parks, reserved for itself several spots for such use, and have now transformed them into well shaded parks with good landing facilities which are open to all."

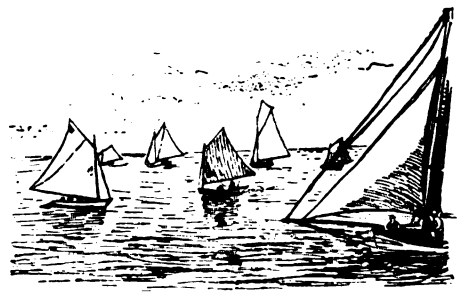
MRS. ADDIE CUMMINGS, GRINDSTONE, N. Y.

The following description of an old-time ocean voyage sounds oddly enough to us who are accustomed to the modern steamer.

"Will you admit a new niece to your charming circle? I wonder if any of the nieces and nephews ever crossed the ocean in a sailing vessel? Such a trip would be quite a novelty in these days of fast steamers. It has been my good fortune to have taken two such voyages—one, made when a little girl of nine or ten, I want to tell you about.

"We went from New York to Buenos Ayres, S. A. We started in January, and the ship had to be cut out of the ice in the harbor. Not long after leaving New York a dreadful storm arose, and I distinctly remember hearing the dishes falling out of the shelves as the ship lurched from side to side, the cabin table—which was fastened to the floor—go over with a crash. But he who controls both wind and wave brought us safely through; and after that we had delightful weather, reaching Montevideo in thirty-eight days after leaving New York; a very quick passage for a sailing vessel. From there we took a river steamer up to Buenos Ayres.

"Two incidents of this voyage are vividly impressed on memory, one is my tenth birthday which came a few weeks after leaving New York. The captain hoisted all the flags on the ship, fired off a small cannon he had on board and ordered a plum pudding for dinner in honor of the event. The other incident was the visit of Neptune on crossing the 'line'. As we approached the equator the captain used to talk mysteriously of the coming of Neptune to initiate the passengers into his domain, and on the day we crossed the line a small boat appeared at the ship's side and some strange-looking men fantastically dressed came on board; and the leader, after whispering with the captain, came to the passengers and pretended to read a long paper and take their names, telling them they must be initiated, but finally let them off, and seizing the cabin boy took him to the lower deck where stood a tub of water with a plank across it; after blacking his face they blindfolded him and set him on the plank, which one of their number tipped up, giving him a ducking. Of course it was the sailors dressed up who had lowered a boat and rowed around the ship pretending to be Neptune and his followers. At night they set a barrel on fire and threw it overboard, the captain telling us it was old Neptune going off to visit other ships.



"Over six years later, when we returned, our voyage lasted nearly three months from the time we left Rosario, on the banks of the Parana, in May, till we reached Boston about the middle of July, and a most delightful trip it was; no storms, but fair weather nearly all the way. We saw lots of flying fish, porpoises, and one or two large whales. Then at night we saw myriads of those wonderful little animalcules that shine with a phosphorescent light making the sea appear as if it was on fire all around the ship. We also sailed through the Sargasso sea, where the ship is surrounded with vast quantities of seaweed. I should like to tell the cousins something of the customs in that far off land, but my letter is already too long." J. M. CARTER, Delhi, N. Y.

Our next letter is a description of a typical summer amusement, boat-racing, but this southern race is, in some respects, different from those at the north.

"An event of much interest to the pleasure-loving people along our coast is the annual regatta that takes place during August or September at Bay St. Louis, Miss. During the preceding month the boats are repaired, repainted and made to look as trim as possible before being entered for the races. A fee of $5—more or less, according to the class of boats—is charged for entering a boat for a race, and this money is used to buy the prizes and also to keep up the club-house and the expenses of a regatta. The prizes are medals, money and silver cups and sometimes other things.

"The day of the regatta is a gala one indeed, and is eagerly looked forward to from year to year and the town is crowded with able and ardent yachtsmen and visitors from all the coast towns and nearby cities.

"Of course the success of the races depends upon the good winds, and these are found to be most favorable in the early afternoon. The boats are numbered and it is a pretty sight to watch them—large and small—with their snow white sails making them look like great birds flying over the water.

REGATTA AT BAY ST. LOUIS.

"Managers time the start of each race, and halfway of the course is a stake boat and as each sailing boat passes her a record of the time made is registered and given the judges at the close of the races. All kinds of boats are allowed to compete. The Mobile Yacht Club and the celebrated Southern Yacht Club of New Orleans, send entries to this regatta; pleasure yachts, coal and lumber schooners, cat boats and many others enter the races and in each class a prize is offered for the fastest sailing boat.

"When the boats come in what cheering for the winners! and after there are suppers on board the yachts and a grand ball is given at the largest hotel or at the club house, which is built over the water half a mile from shore. Smaller dances are given at private homes and these places are decorated with numerous flags and gayly colored Chinese lanterns and when these are lighted at night the places look like fairy land. The prizes are awarded amid cheers and hearty good will, refreshments are served and 'the play is over' at a late hour."

LOUELLA SPENCE, Pass Christian, Miss.

Our next letter tells us of the construction of a broom, but our cousin does not tell us where she has seen them made, so we must guess at that.

"Did you ever see a broom made? The broom-corn is cut, just above the smooth stem, into equal lengths, after the seed is thrashed or shaken out. A little machine is used, with a spool of fine strong wire attached. To this machine, through a groove, the handle is fastened and the wire made firm. Then a quantity of cut corn is taken up and wired around one end to form a handle, the wire being wound firmly and straightly, till the broom is of the requisite thickness. The last layers are left with the top of the stalk split and adjusted so that the wire can be turned in a fanciful manner and fastened to the wood handle."

ELIZABETH J. WILSON, Beverly, Mass.

"It was the day before Oklahoma was to be declared open for settlement. For months people had been coming in from every direction toward the free land. The streets of Winfield and Arkansas City were thronged and the prairie schooners formed one continuous line from Winfield to Arkansas City—a distance of fifteen miles, along the boundary line which divided Kansas from No Man's Land.

"Night came on and there was not much abatement of the tumult. The moon shone clear and bright and at intervals all night long the clattering of horses' hoofs could be heard and a man, sometimes two or five would come in sight and gallop off down into the promised land.

"The next day, before the signal gun was fired to declare Oklahoma open for settlement, thousands of men, women and children, restless with suspense and strained almost to frenzy with excitement and expectation, were ready to rush pell mell into the declared land for a claim.

"At last the signal was given and a regular stampede commenced, each trying to be first to get to the best claims. Carts were upset, wheels snatched from wagons and people trampled under foot in the melee. The first claim was taken by a woman, who, rushing across the line with a large flag in her hand planted it upon a splendid claim, then shouted wildly, 'This claim is taken!'

"Ere the sun set on that day every claim that was of any worth was taken and some claims had two and three contestants. Some got their rights and some did not."

FLYING MACHINES

Will come next but at present we offer something entirely new in Balloons. There is nothing quite so fascinating to old or young as watching the airy flight of a Balloon, and a foreign inventor has just gotten a patent on a new idea in paper Balloons. They rise from a table in the house or ascend heavenward in the open air. They excite the greatest curiosity every where they are shown and thousands are now sold daily in Europe. "COMFORTS" Foreign artist saw them in "London" and sent a large invoice across the Atlantic so we could be the first to advertise them in America. To first introduce, we are going to give away several thousand as we know we afterwards can sell more than a million of these torpedo Balloons. All we want is to get new three months' trial Subscription to "COMFORT" and if you send six cents for your own or a friend's subscription we will send you a package of ten Balloons Free Post Paid. You make big profits if you want to exhibit or sell them. So send six cents early and get the agency. Don't wait but write and get your friends to write to-day.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE following "Notes" from Lee McCrae of Indianapolis, will be very acceptable to the Bees, we are sure, who will thank her for the sensible suggestions therein:

A child's thimble makes an admirable glove darner when that convenient little article is misplaced.

If the home dressmaker would iron out her paper patterns just before using, her cutting would be much easier and more exact.

Try the curved nail scissors for cutting out hamburg edgings.

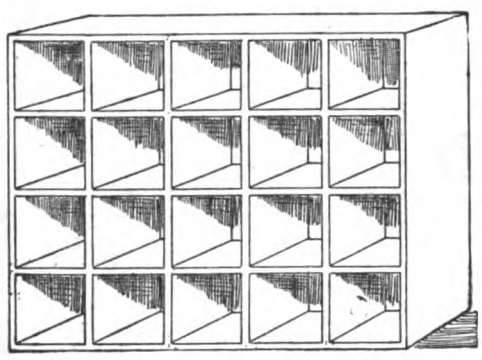
When a kid glove begins to cut at the end, usually over the fingernail, insert a piece of kid to match on the inside, catching it to the seams. If neatly done it will not be clumsy looking, and it will delay the break for weeks.

The woman who would be economical and at the same time save herself many an annoyance, should select one size and shade of stationary, and resolutely stick to it. Then there will be no box full of paper and envelopes that look like a sample case, and refuse utterly to "keep company" with one another.

How often we have heard that we must shake all medicines before taking, yet few of us know the chief reason. Besides the fact that many ingredients do not mix well, and that the heavier, which settles to the bottom, may be rank poison when taken alone—many remedies (and all patent medicines,) have alcohol put in to preserve them. It forms a layer on the top, effectually corking the contents from the air; hence, if the bottle is not shaken, one may get a full dose of pure spirits.

The fashionable hat could never be trimmed by amateurs. It is a scheme of the milliners, and would be entirely successful but for the fact that they reckoned without their—sailors. Let the girl of small pocketbook and large wits invest in a trim white sailor of the best quality and the usual black band; but for the sake of a long suffering public, do not let her inflict that monotonous hat upon it every day of the week. It and her upper bureau drawer form a whole millinery store. Change No. 1; Let her fasten a white band and a smart bow tightly around it. Then a fringed Roman tie knotted loosely, or a pretty dotted veil to match her suit. A pink or scarlet band softened by a dainty white veil is a still prettier effect while the veil may be caught at one side by a bunch of sweet peas or any flower particularly suited to her taste and attire. By changing it frequently she becomes the envy of her companions who "can have only one hat because they are so expensive," and who always looks the same.

"E. J. C." of Emporia Kansas, has kindly donated the following description of a pretty rug, which will also be received with thanks by the Bees. She says:



"I will tell the Bees of a rug that is both useful and ornamental, and costs so little that any one could afford to have several like it. The material was scraps of soft woolen goods that were left when dresses were made, and were of every color and shape imaginable; several partly worn cashmere and flannel skirts; children's dresses, and anything else of that kind that I could find. These were saved until I had a cracker box full before I began to work. The small pieces were cut into strips one and one half inches wide, and any length. Then they were gathered through the middle upon a coarse thread (No. 8) and pushed up close enough to make a round roll like chenille. The colors were placed hit or miss, and were not sewed together like carpet rags, but the ends were lapped one upon another and gathered through them. Part of the dress skirts were dyed red, and part brown with diamond dye, cut in strips and gathered like the others, keeping each color separate. They were then taken to a weaver who furnished the chain and wove it like rag carpet, except that only half the usual amount of chain was used. It is twenty-seven inches wide and one and one-fourth yards long. The hit or miss part was used for the center, with a border of red and brown stripes across the ends. This rug was taken to a county fair last fall and came back bearing a blue ribbon, which announced the fact that it had been awarded the first prize in that department. These rugs are very durable, and plenty of material for making them may be found in every house, for pieces that are too small for anything else can be used in this way. The center may be of a plain color if preferred, with a border of some bright color that will harmonize with it."

Now for a few of our own ideas. We trust the one of a sleeveless nightgown will be both new and acceptable to our readers, for it is the most comfortable garment imaginable, for summer wear. Take the advice of one who knows what she is saying, and make one before another sun sets—for it takes only a few hours of time, if one is deft with the needle. Use English long cloth, which is fine and soft and without dressing; cut with opening for the head and arms, like a chemise, having the neck large enough to admit of gathering quite full across the front and back, making the neck as low as one likes; of course it cannot be very high, without having an opening down the back or front of the gown, as the head could not pass through. It is supposed to be low enough to admit of the head passing through with no other opening. Put a full ruffle of fine hamburg edging six inches deep around this neck opening, and above it put an inch wide insertion, through which run satin ribbon. Around the arms eyes gather the hamburg in the same manner, omitting even the faintest hint of a sleeve. If it is desired to make a more elaborate gown, put rows of the insertion across the front of the gown. This garment is exactly like a chemise, except that it is long. Trimmings of soft imitation val. lace are very satisfactory, as they do not take up as much starch as hamburg does, when laundered, and of course are for that reason more comfortable—for what is more irritating than stiff frills on a nightgown. Of course gowns of this kind can be varied in a number of ways, and when one has made one, it is very easy to make more. Those for sale in the shops have a short puff for the sleeve, instead of the fall of embroidery only, but are not as pretty, nor are they as comfortable and cool. Made in delicate colors, of nainsook, they are exquisite—though I think a dainty woman usually prefers white for all her underwear.

Now that we are on this subject, a recent bride had a sachet for her nightgowns, which was made of white satin, large and slightly padded and perfumed with violets. On the upper side her name was embroidered. The case was tied with satin ribbons.

We give an illustration of a shoe box, which, while not being exactly a thing of beauty, is a most convenient affair. Every woman knows that her shoes, if kept on the floor of her closet are always in disorder and in the way, also covered with dust. If she has a bag fastened to the wall or to the closet door, it is always sticking out in the way, or else falling down, or the shoes are falling out. Now here is an idea, original with us, which any one can have. The one in question is built at the end of a closet, taking up the whole width of the closet, which is thirty-eight inches wide. The height of this box is twenty-two inches, and the individual boxes, or pigeon-holes are eight inches deep and five inches high. There is no back to the box—simply a set of pigeon-holes set in against the wall of the closet, and fastened there. In this way the shoes are kept out of the way and perfectly free from dust and quite accessible, and yet only eight inches of space has been taken from the depth of the closet.

The well-known heavy dyke on the Holland coast was built by the winds themselves.

DENIZENS of the desert will not drink pure water; they say pure running water makes them violently ill, while the most poisonous looking water agrees with them. It is said that stagnant water at first produces nausea and fever, but when once the system has become used to it, it has no such effect, while pure water affects the system in this way after using the stagnant.

STARTLING REVELATION.

The Remarkable Achievements of Prof. Weltmer, the Great Healer, Are Causing Universal Astonishment.

The Nineteenth Century has been correctly termed the most important in scientific advancement and mental development, but no new discovery in any line is at this time attracting such widespread attention as Prof. Weltmer's Method of Magnetic Healing. In fact, the phenomenal cures made by him during the past two years have been so remarkably astounding and wonderful as to demand the attention of scientific and medical men all over the world. His method of treatment banishes disease as if by magic. Hon. Press Irons, Mayor of Nevada, was afflicted with kidney and bladder troubles for ten years and could find no relief in the usual remedies. In one week he was completely restored by Prof. Weltmer. Not only does this remarkable man cure hundreds in his Infirmary, but he possesses the ability to cure at a distance, and all cures made by this method are equally permanent. Mrs. Jennie L. Linch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles. In less than 30 days she was cured. Mrs. M. M. Walker, Poca, W. Va., suffered severely with female troubles and eczema and was entirely restored by Prof. Weltmer in a month. Thousands of other sufferers all over the land have been restored in the same manner. This is positively the only known cure for lost vitality and kindred ailments. Send for a copy of the Magnetic Journal, a 40-page illustrated magazine, giving a long list of the most astounding cures ever performed. It is sent free.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

THE proper food to be taken on summer outings, such as picnics, is quite a study. The things that appeal to the appetite are hard to transport, and of course one wants to take as few baskets and boxes as possible; so, in order to get up a substantial lay-out for ten or a dozen people, that will look well when disgorged from the receptacle in which it is brought, is quite a problem. If twenty-five or more people are to partake of the lunch the matter is simplified, as things can be taken in quantities—that is, whole chickens and hams—whole cakes and pies, and loaves of bread, lemons, etc., but when the lunch is for the few, the sandwiches must be made up before starting out, the salads prepared and everything be in readiness so that no more things need be carried than is absolutely necessary.

For sandwiches, make some of plain bread and butter, to be eaten with the preserves or currant jelly which should be among the good things. Some should also be made with a thin slice of cheese (Swiss preferably) between two unbuttered slices of bread. Make some also of ham, chicken, salmon or lettuce. Cut off all crusts, pack the sandwiches closely and compactly into boxes which have nothing else in them but sandwiches, first laying a wet napkin into the box to keep them moist and soft.

A salad of some kind is almost a necessity, as it gives the necessary acid to the repast. A vegetable salad of lettuce, tomatoes, cucumbers and radishes, mixed with a French dressing is delicious at such a time; chicken or lobster salad, also salmon salad, mixed with mayonnaise dressing is next best. Eggs in some form should be there, either hard boiled and served in the shell with pepper and salt, or arranged before starting from home, in a large flat box, on lettuce leaves. The eggs should first be boiled hard, left to cool, and the shells removed, the eggs cut in halves, the yolks taken out without destroying the shape of the white part, and mixed with a small amount of mayonnaise dressing; then returned to the white part carefully and smoothed off, and each half placed upon its bed of lettuce. Place lettuce leaves over the top, when the box is full, and then fasten the cover on to the box so the eggs will not be disturbed in transportation; then serve them from the box.

Sardines are appetizing at such a lunch, when of course crackers and lemons should keep them company. The dried beef which comes put up so nicely in small boxes, is also an addition which is easy to carry.

Something sweet to finish off the repast should be at hand for those who care for it, though as a rule sweets aren't much cared for at outdoor suppers. Berries can be taken along very nicely in the baskets in which they are bought, and sugar in a box.

The small and large flat boxes which come from the caterers during the year, when extras are bought, should be saved for the summer picnics, as they are light and easy to carry, and when used can be thrown away, and so lessen the luggage to be carried home.

It is a good idea to make a punch before leaving home, carrying it in a preserve jar and adding water and ice after everything else is ready. A good rule to follow is to use the juice of twelve lemons and two oranges, and two cups of sugar. Then cut into this two bananas, some strawberries and some slices of lemon and orange. If desired a pint of claret may be added, which, with two quarts of water added just as it is to be served, makes a rich and delicious punch.

Now for a home salad which we think will be new to most of our readers.

HAM SALAD.

Soak one-half tablespoonful granulated gelatine in one and one-half tablespoonfuls cold water; then dissolve in three-quarters of a cup of hot chicken liquor. Strain over one cup cooked and chopped ham and stir, letting it stand in ice water, until the mixture thickens. Fold in one cup thick cream beaten stiff and a few grains of paprica and salt if needed. Put into a mould, a ring mould preferred, and before serving fill the center with fresh lettuce leaves. Pass mayonnaise dressing with this salad, when served.

RUSSIAN SALAD.

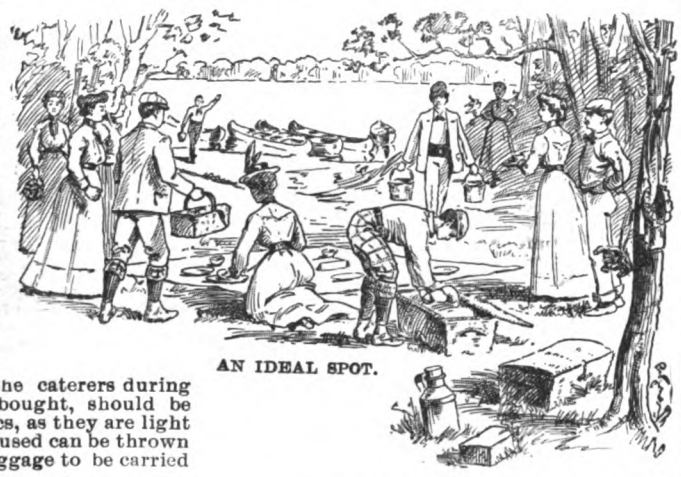
Take one cup each of cold, boiled carrots, potatoes, peas and string beans. Cut the potatoes, carrots and beans into small pieces and pour over them and the peas separately French dressing. Arrange each vegetable by itself on a platter, in a nest of lettuce leaves. Then on the top of one of the sections pile some finely chopped beet, previously boiled; on the next section the finely chopped whites of hard boiled eggs; on the third the yolks of these eggs, mashed through a fine sieve, and on the last some smoked salmon. Use mayonnaise dressing, if preferred to the French.

GREEN-PEA SALAD.

Cook a pint of young peas with a tablespoonful of butter and as little salted water as possible, stirring constantly until the peas are tender and the water evaporated. Let them cool. Arrange on a serving dish some fresh lettuce; over this spread a cup and a half of finely chopped cold lamb or chicken. Pour the peas over the meat. Mix together six tablespoonfuls oil, one-half teaspoonful salt and a little pepper; add gradually three tablespoonfuls lemon juice or vinegar and pour this dressing over the salad. Sprinkle the whole with mint leaves, chopped very fine.

CABBAGE SALAD.

Chop finely a head of white cabbage; pour over this a French dressing, or one made of one cup vinegar, two tablespoons sugar, a little salt, paprica, mustard and the yolk of one hard-boiled egg, rubbed fine. Let the mixture stand in a cold place for two hours. Have ready some boiled beets, cold; chop them fine and pour over them enough vinegar to cover, letting this mixture stand the same length of time. Serve individually on good-sized plates; pile in the center of each plate some of the cabbage; around this put a ring of the pickled beet, and then garnish with a wreath of parsley around the edge and a small sprig standing up from the center. Red cabbage may be used in the same way, but in place of the beets use a ring of hard-boiled eggs cut in slices; garnish with parsley.



DANDELION SALAD.

Almost every one is fond of dandelion greens, but how many have ever tried the leaves without their being cooked? Some one who has, says they make a delicious salad. Use only the perfectly fresh, crisp leaves and dress them with oil, lemon juice, salt and pepper. Add to these a little grated horseradish, if it is liked, or vary the dressing in any way desired, and so add another to the list of green salads.

An idea was lately evolved by a bright young person, who gave what she called a "progressive luncheon." On the covers of half of those present lay a letter "S," and the hostess arose to explain that this signified that the persons sitting at these places at table were to change seats at each course, with the second person on the left—that is, was to "skip" one, each course, and so, in time, would be far removed from the ones who were neighbors at the beginning of the meal. This gave every one a chance to meet every one else, and so no one got out of ideas of subjects for conversation, for they could say the same things over again, if hard pressed, as the neighbor would be a new one in each case.

We recently heard some one complaining of their kitchen being over-run with little red ants. An easy way to get rid of them is to take small pieces of coarse sponge, sprinkle sugar in the cavities and place them where the ants are seen. Large numbers will collect on the sponges, and they should then be picked up quickly and carefully and dropped into a dish of hot water, which should be ready for that purpose. Repeat this operation and all the ants will soon be disposed of. We wish we had as effective and easy a remedy to suggest for the extermination of water-bugs, with which some one else is afflicted. She has tried all of the so-called effectual remedies on the market, but cannot get entirely rid of them. We shall be very grateful if our readers can suggest something for this perplexed housewife to do in order to rid her kitchen of these horrid things.

It is said that Lilli Lehman, the great singer, follows this bill of fare daily: At 7:30 a. m. she has a glass of milk with rye bread and a little fruit; at noon, vegetable soup and a plate of vegetables; at 4 o'clock in the afternoon a glass of milk, and at seven in the evening some green salad, two eggs, or some cheese. Sometimes during the day she eats fruit. When she is to sing at night she takes a plate of rice at noon, and eats nothing more until after the opera—usually about midnight. Once in a great while she drinks a glass of beer with a friend, but very rarely. As will be seen, she is a vegetarian.

"CALTHOS"

Prof. Laborde's Marvelous French Cure for Lost Manhood.

FIVE DAYS' TRIAL TREATMENT

Sent Absolutely Free by Sealed Mail To All Sufferers.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

The only preparation known to science which really cures Lost Manhood is "CALTHOS," the marvelous French remedy discovered by Prof. Jules Laborde. It is controlled in this country by The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, a concern which occupies a high and honorable place in the world of medicine. It is one of the largest and most responsible houses in Cincinnati, as anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

The Von Mohl Company invites all men suffering from Lost Manhood, Spermatorrhœa, Varicocele, Small Parts or Weakness of any nature in the Nerves or Sexual Organs, to send their names and receive a five days' treatment. This will prove the wonderful vitalizing powers of "CALTHOS." After using it five days the sufferers will find new vigor in their organs, new force in their muscles, new blood in their veins, new ambition, and rapid progress toward the buoyant feelings and sensations of younger days.

This liberal free offer is genuine. There is no swindling C. O. D. or Deposit Scheme connected with it. The five days' treatment is sent by sealed mail to all on request, wrapped in a plain package, and full printed instructions accompany the medicine, so that each patient becomes his own doctor and cures himself at home.

It doesn't make any difference what caused the weakness—whether bad habits in youth, or excess, or overwork, or business troubles. "CALTHOS" will effect a cure, no matter what big name the disease may be called by doctors.

The Von Mohl Company treats all correspondence in perfect confidence. Under no conditions will it make public the names of the thousands who have written testimonials telling of their restoration to robust manhood after other medicines and appliances have proved worthless. "CALTHOS" is regularly used in the French and German armies, and the soldiers in those countries have come to be perfect models of strength and vitality. Cures are effected at all ages from twenty to eighty years. There is no case (except where the stage of epilepsy or insanity has been reached) which it will not radically, quickly and permanently cure. Sexual weakness does not cure itself. It grows worse from week to week. Each day aggravates the mental and physical anguish.

Send today for the free five days' trial treatment. If it helps you, more of the medicine can be purchased. If it does not help, no harm is done and no money has been paid out. You can send your name in the full knowledge that it will be kept from all. The "CALTHOS" department of our business is strictly confidential. Address applications for trial treatment, etc., to

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

CONDUCTED BY COUSIN MARION.

Here's a summer greeting to you all, my dears, with not only the warmth of your Cousin Marion's sincerity in it, but the warmth of the middle month of summer also. Still we ought to have the fragrance of the June roses in our hearts and that is always good in all kinds of weather.

The first cousin in the list is Nellie Gray of Blue Ridge, Ga., and Nellie wants to know if the young man she loves loves her, would he tell her so or must she encourage him by showing him that she loves him. I can hardly understand a girl being silly enough to ask a question like this, but somehow most of them are, bless their hearts, and I don't see how it is to be stopped. Dear, dear Nellie, don't you know you shouldn't have fallen in love first? Why didn't you wait as women must? Since you have not, you must suffer, and I am sure that if he loved you he would tell you so. Men always do that if they are at all in love.

Ida M. C., Portersville, W. Va.—This is not a "correspondent wanted" column nor can I give you the information you seek.

P. A. M., Gray, N. Y.—Be careful how you ask conundrums unless you know the real answers.

Estella, Red Bud, Kan.—"The Wandering Jew," so called, is a creature of fiction and was not heard of until twelve hundred years after Christ.

Maybell J., Monticello, Ills.—Write to the Managers of the theaters in Chicago and St. Louis enclosing stamp for reply from each one to whom you write. My advice to you most earnestly is to save your postage.

Subscriber, Bristol, Tenn.—Here are a few names for a bicycle club: Bristolia, Wheelerina, Cyclerina, or any one of a dozen names of local interest about your neighborhood.

Ruby and Marie, La Moure, N. D.—A girl of sixteen may go to the opera with a man over twenty, but her mother should be of the party. In fact it should be her mother's party. (2) In the smaller towns and cities a business acquaintance is recognized, though people don't as a rule meet socially unless formally introduced.

Inquirer, Manitowoc, Wis.—Consult your family physician on the subject of hypnotism and its practice. (2) The only way to learn what papers buy stories is to send your stories around till they are bought.

Blue Eyes, Milton, W. Va.—It is embarrassing for a skirt to come unfastened in a public place, but there is nothing to do but trust to your woman's tact and the help of the other women around. And there isn't anything to say. Etiquette fails to prescribe any set rules for such trying ordeals.

C. H. M. E., Davenport, Ia.—You might take off your mourning and go to the wedding in all white, but you had better ask your friends about it, for opinions and customs differ. As to what a bride receives there is also a wide difference in opinion and custom.

Kate, Westport, Pa.—I should most emphatically say that five girls should not call on young men at their club, however briefly they remained or whatever their business.

B. B., Tuscola, Ills.—Why should you want to send a tender poem to a young man who has not written to you for three months? Don't you think it would be nicer to wait until he sent the poetry to you? Don't bother the young man with yourself; there is nothing more disagreeable to a man than the girl he doesn't want who wants him.

Anna and May, Poland, N. Y.—The hair is nearly red and nearly any color may be worn with it except shades and tints of red. Wear your hair in the style most becoming to you, even if it is not quite the prevailing fashion. (2) The United States has not yet adopted a national flower.

M. A. C., Magnolia, Miss.—Twenty-nine is an excellent age at which to marry, and you ought to be glad you have lived single so long. I haven't space to answer all the details you ask about weddings. Any arrangement that pleases you most is the best one. (2) Introduce the groom-to-be to two or three of the young men in your town and let him ask them.

Peggy and Patty, Brimfield, Ill.—Girls of sixteen are yet of "school age" and should be in school not "in company." (2) The custom of permitting the man to take the lady's arm is so awkward and bad that I wouldn't do it if all the people in my town did. (3) There are many good and safe face powders. I have no especial choice.

Katie, New Orleans, La.—The etiquette governing the wedding of a divorced woman is the same as if she had never been married. (2) A doctor's patient need not worry over any seeming slights she may think he observes. If he is at all interested in her he will let her know. If he is a bit jealous, all the better. But don't be too anxious to have a jealous man forever nagging you.

Addie B., Bagwell, Texas.—Your questions can not be answered until Judgment Day and then not by me.

Lily and Irene, Holland, Miss.—Ask your fathers and your brothers. They can tell you better than I can.

L. E. B., Lincoln, Nebraska.—Ask your family physician to give you the address of a reliable dermatologist and write to him. Ask him for the cause.

Daisy Dell, Roswell, N. M.—There is no set form of remarks when a young man puts a silver heart on a girl's bracelet. His heart or his gallantry ought to tell him what to say. 16 to 1 he loves her.

W. E. B., Monmouth, Ills.—In a way, yes, there is such a thing as love at first sight, but love of slower growth is less risky, as a rule. (2) No, I do not believe that somewhere in the world the only man waits for the only woman, or the reverse. Too many people marry three or four times for that theory to hold.

Carrie V. N., Leroy, Minn.—Don't worry about the music you will lose. If you love it sufficiently well to suffer enough for its loss, you will find a way to keep it up.

Pearl Baker, Beulah, N. M.—Write to any well-known jeweler, in Santa Fe for the information, inclosing postage for reply.

Rena, Fountain City, Ind.—The "minute points" in social usage that you ask for cannot be told to you. They must be acquired by practice. Go on as you are going, always observant and always studying what is the best and you will learn it better than the book can teach you. You will also learn what are the best books to read on the subject of etiquette.

Jacinto, Honitos, Texas.—When a man and two girls are all equally in love with each other, it is a safe thing for each of them to go and find an entire stranger to marry.

Self Culture, Hillsdale, Canada.—It is proper enough for a young lady to receive the calls of other men when she is engaged, but not advisable for her to go walking with any except her affianced. (2) Make the men keep their distance always. Permit no liberties. (3) Don't know about the people you ask for and cannot learn. Don't know handwriting.

Silver Gray, Red Oak, Mo.—By all means give him the mitten in the presence of his mother. A woman of her age ought to know better than to want her son to marry a girl of sixteen.

Perplexed, Pueblo, Col.—It is not improper to wave to a man when he is too far away to speak to, but it isn't necessary, usually. (2) Don't have your picture in his watch case unless you are engaged to him. (3) How often does the man call "once in a while" who wants to kiss you that often? Suppose you ask your father or guardian and tell him the man's name. (3) Always turn to the right in meeting people, if you can.

Blossom, Peoria, Ill.—Eighteen year old girls wear their dresses full length and their hair not hanging down their back, even if it is a little short.

Bells, Denver, Col.—Long engagements are not considered good, because when two people love each other enough to become engaged they should marry and take their proper place in the social fabric.

Sunflower, Hoxie, Kans.—It is all right not to invite the parents of the groom to a wedding at the residence of the bride's parents if there is a row between the families, but not otherwise.

J. R. D., Ashwood, Tenn.—It is quite correct to be kissed by the man to whom you are engaged to be married. His mother and sisters should call on you or you can go to see them.

Bertie B., Hazard, Neb.—You did perfectly right in refusing to let the young man go home with you after his ungentlemanly conduct in church. If he wants to argue the point, tell him you will ask his own sister or his mother what they think. (2) The lady always takes the man's arm.

Ella, Cottage Home, Tenn.—See answer to J. R. D. second above this. (2) The man always gives the girl an engagement ring no matter how poor he is. If he can't do that much he isn't any earthly good.

Now, dears, that answers the last one, and I am glad to see that you are all improving. May you keep cool until we meet again.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE heavenly speculum at the New Moon, which occurs at about twenty minutes of seven o'clock in the morning, Washington Mean time, on the 6th day of August, 1899, shows the first degrees of Virgo rising and the 28th degree of Taurus culminating. The lunation falls in the 14th degree of the sign Leo in the middle of the house; Saturn and Herschel are in the 4th house; Neptune is in the 10th; Venus is on the cusp of the 12th, Mars is in the 2nd in benevolent aspect with Venus and Herschel who are in benevolent trine with each other; Jupiter is in the 3rd house in square with Venus but in benevolent sextile with Mercury who is ruler of the scheme and just rising in the east at the time of the conduction. Mercury, ruler of the figure, is strongly placed and is well supported by the great benefic who disposes of both Saturn and Herschel, the last of which afflicts Mercury. The ruler so placed according to the books presignifies pleasant and wholesome air, comfortable and seasonable showers and rains and plenty of the fruits of the earth, though the presence of the great malefics in the 4th prevents the fullest realization of those benefits from Mother Earth in certain sections of our country, though cannot prevail at large against the general promises of good to the whole country.

Mars in the 2nd, though not afflicting, but rather supporting the other heavenly bodies, makes some unusual drafts upon the Nation's exchequer, probably for purposes of warfare or payment for war service; there will be a liberal distribution of the Nation's funds among the people both for labor and material for armament or defensive works, though the square of Herschel to Mercury, promises some severe criticism from the "eccentrics" and fault-finders.

Venus in sextile with Mars and squared by Jupiter points to an unusual inclination towards the pleasures and recreations of life during the lunation, attended by too wasteful expenditures for such sports. Jupiter and Mercury indicates that men shall be ingenious and inventive, and prosperous and successful in their short journeyings, also harmonious dealings with our neighbors in the northeast, especially in questions involving our fisheries in those directions.

The action of the great malefics in Sagittarius cautions against increased prevalence of liver and bowel disorders and though quarantine regulations may work annoyances in some quarters the sanitary authorities should not neglect such necessary precautions as will prevent the introduction of any epidemic disease involving those parts of the body. Scientific and literary men meet with some unusual difficulties in the lunation and the obituary of the month will be likely to obtain the names of some very eminent persons, especially near the 20th and 27th of August and around the 5th and 12th of September.

The month brings the great malefics to their stationary positions in Sagittarius from the 11th to 25th and it is apprehended that Spain will pass through another phase of the political disease that has for many months afflicted her, and as Mars begins his transit through Libra at the time of this lunation we may reasonably look for unusual trouble for Austria and Hungary, and some outbreak or disasters in Chinese regions.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR AUGUST, 1899.

AUGUST. 1—Tuesday. Deceptive appearances and baffling hindrances are likely in the real estate transactions of this day; give thy landlord a wide berth nor have anything to do with persons who are engaged in trade in coal, lumber, wood, agricultural products or who are in the laborious or dirty avocations; little permanent advantage will result from undertakings commenced at this time; be slow to make purchases for trade nor should wearing apparel be now bought for personal use.

2—Wednesday. Disputes and quarrels are easy of birth in the morning hours when no surgical operations should be performed, especially upon the hands or arms or in the abdominal regions; let all efforts be pushed vigorously as the noon time is passed; have dealings with persons in the literary walks of life, booksellers, stationers, printers, commercial men, bankers, judges, and persons of wealth and station. Purchase goods for trade, launch literary productions, travel, and concern thyself with writings, contracts, accounts, and all educational work; hire help, do correspondence and otherwise employ the strictly mental faculties, even late into the night hours.

3—Thursday. A day greatly to be avoided for wooing or wedding and ladies should be wary of new faces now presenting themselves among their suitors; those who wed on this day will have cause to repent their act, unless the nativities were exceptionally good radically; do not make any new beginning of consequence on this day, nor expect any favor from money lenders, public officers or railway employees.

4—Friday. Quite a fortunate day for music, painting and the fine arts generally; the influences are quite propitious for most things, but particularly in the last half of the day for dealings with military men, druggists, glass-manufacturers and those engaged in the ingenious and mechanical trades; deal in cattle, metals, chemicals, machinery, tools, explosives, and all electrical goods.

5—Saturday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday throughout this day but do not make any purchases for speculative purposes; let the musician and artist earnestly improve the morning hours, and commercial men trading in wearing apparel or wares that please and gratify mankind should urge their sales to the utmost. Better than ordinary success attends mercantile, commercial, and literary affairs just now in the lives of persons born about the 4th of March, 6th or 23rd of April, 25th of June, 6th of September, 9th or 26th of October, or the 25th of December, of past years; but the contrary is likely to persons born about the 22nd of February, 24th of May or 25th of November, of past years, as they are likely to be having temporary mental anxieties, controversies or annoyances in correspondence.

6—Sunday. One of the promising Sabbath days of the month, particularly conducive to the success of pulpit efforts; the religious discourse will be earnest and eloquent.

7—Monday. Bright and prosperous are the conditions of this day; authors are particularly favored and publishers and dealers in scientific, literary or artistic works or productions should vigorously improve every moment; use the time for urging all honorable transactions, but especially mental efforts and the beginning and pursuit of all literary undertakings and generally for the planning of all enterprises of moment, business arrangements, commercial contracts, journeys, educational schemes, stock and monetary programmes and ecclesiastical or judicial deliberations and decisions; have negotiations with banks and monied men; purchase goods for trade and speculate if thy nativity also favors.

8—Tuesday. Thy petition for advantage at the hands of officers of large corporations or from persons noted for marked peculiarity of habit or dress will find less than usual favor during the early forenoon of this day when also thou shouldest not be misled by the glamor of appearances in the enterprises then presenting themselves; the day is better after the morning and should be vigorously used for urging all thine undertakings.

9—Wednesday. The early and late hours are the poorest and ought not to be chosen for inaugurating any new venture; the very early hours are peculiarly mischievous in the production of fires and bad accidents involving hurts to human beings; let all have care in this respect that carelessness does not permit such occurrences in the night hours between the 8th and 9th; the middle hours of the day are to be given the preference for the best efforts in all honorable pursuits.

10—Thursday. Do not be over-sensitive or become involved in disputes during the very early morning, when have no dealings with persons in the mechanical callings or manufacturing enterprises; the balance of the day invites the seeking of favor from heads of departments and public officials and the vigorous prosecution of thy works and enterprises pertaining to the literary and scientific world and to the elegant avocations in life; conditions encourage special activity in dealings in fancy goods, jewelry, perfumes, silks and all articles of adornment. Begin thy journey, take recreation and seek pleasure and amusement; the afternoon promises very favorably for the matrimonial engagements or for the solemnization of the marital relations.

11—Friday. This day is peculiarly favorable for dealings in real estate and for all manner of contracts looking to its improvement and for all agricultural undertakings. Money negotiations pertaining to houses and lands, and trading in productions of the earth are favored in an unusual degree on this day, and REGULUS advises his friends to fully use the time as indicated. Consult thy dentist at this time.

12—Saturday. Another of the excellent days of the month; REGULUS advises all of his friends to take advantage of this day and enter with zeal upon their various pursuits in life; buy goods for trade, engage in new enterprises, speculate if the nativity be fairly favorable; deal with judges, counsellors, ecclesiastics, and traders in wool and woolens.

13—Sunday. An unfavorable Sabbath day for the exercises appropriate, and generally for the literary and artistic classes; the hours tend more to ards pleasure-seeking and personal gratifications.

14—Monday. The week opens with a very evil day and REGULUS cautions his friends against entering at this time upon any new business or enterprise, for nothing now begun will prosper nor should any permanent benefit or advantage be expected from the general transactions of the day; do not travel if it can be avoided and beware of incurring the displeasure of those in authority; government officials and officers of railroads and other large corporations will not be favorably disposed. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday, do thou exercise extraordinary care in all thine acts for several weeks to come and particular caution is prompted as to diet and such habits as give plethora or aggravate heart weakness.

15—Tuesday. Begin thy labors early and urge to the utmost all the mechanical and chemical pursuits; deal in metals, cattle, leather, drugs, hardware and cutlery and initiate thine undertakings in the manufacturing lines.

16—Wednesday. Avoid thy landlord in the morning when also have no dealings concerned with lands, mines, or agricultural products; seek favor from persons in authority during the middle hours of the day, and urge all literary engagements, correspondence, and commercial contracts after 10 o'clock in the morning. Mental efforts will prove more satisfactory than usual in the evening unless thy nativity is radically adverse in that respect.

17—Thursday. Give preference to the first half of the day for the vigorous prosecution of all honorable business; buy thy goods for trade, and deal with banks and persons of wealth, also lawyers, judges and ecclesiastics; the afternoon inaugurates a train of mischievous conditions conducive to strife and controversy in matters then begun, and ought not to be taken for any beginning of consequence.

18—Friday. The afternoon is the best part of this day and should be given preference for dealings pertaining to the articles of adornment and decoration and for matters concerned with the elegant and artistic in life.

19—Saturday. Hold on to the pennies during the forenoon when no purchases should be made for speculation; as the noon is approached let all the mechanical and chemical pursuits be urged to their utmost; deal in metals, cattle, and the chemicals also with cutlers, surgeons, barkers, barbers, tailors, tanners and carpenters; consult thy dentist and experiment in chemistry.

20—Sunday. The early morning hours are the best; the noon and afternoon are mischievous and likely to interfere with domestic tranquility and contributing to strife and disruption in both the social and more tender relations.

21—Monday. Vigorously use the middle hours of this day, especially for replenishing thy stock in trade, dealing in wool and woolens, having money transactions, and generally crowding all honorable pursuits; be guarded against disputes in the evening.

22—Tuesday. An unpromising day; discouraging for the purse and embarrassing to the progress of enterprises. REGULUS advises all who were born about the 13th of January, 7th of March, 20 of May, 8th of June, 15th of July, 10th of September, 29th of November, or the 9th of December, of past years, to exercise extraordinary care in matters of both health and finance for a season; misfortunes are easy of birth under these conditions and disorders in business affairs, discord or bereavement in the family circle, and low physical conditions are among some of the trials under prevailing influences in such lives; the passing time is, however, more favorable than otherwise for persons born about the 6th of February or April, 6th of August, or 12th of October of past years, conducing to financial betterment through dealings in landed property or from the estates of deceased persons or from dealings in agricultural or mining products and promoting physical improvement from out-of-door recreations and amusements.

23—Wednesday. Use the first two-thirds of the day for thy best efforts, but look out as the afternoon advances not to become involved in any dispute or controversy; keep the temper and be not over-sensitive in thy dealings with associates.

24—Thursday. One of the best days in the month for beginnings of all kinds and REGULUS charges his friends to make beginnings here in all new undertakings and to urge all honorable pursuits, especially such as pertain to the literary affairs or commerce in any of its branches; deal with the artist, musician, and all in the polite callings; bargain and sell houses and lands; purchase materials for manufacture and merchandise for trade; seek money accommodations and deal with persons of wealth and standing. Rarely do influences combine so favorably as on this day and it is earnestly recommended for full employment. It is peculiarly favorable as a birthday anniversary and gives promise of great good to those who claim it.

25—Friday. Seek favors from persons in public places during the morning hours, but look out for bad losses as the noon is passed and see that no purchases are then made for goods to be sold again. Urge thy sales of fancy and ornamental wares at this time.

26—Saturday. Give preference to the forenoon for forwarding thy ventures already in hand, but do not make any new enterprises; defer matters of much importance in the literary pursuits; do not sign writings or make engagements or contracts; the evening is very evil for any mental efforts and invites watchfulness against deceit and thievish actions.

27—Sunday. Unfavorable for church matters; strange troubles come at this time and pulpit efforts will not be notable for soundness of either logic or judgment; public or railway affairs are not likely to be peaceful or prosperous in these passing days and bad accidents are to be guarded against in travel.

28—Monday. Drive thy business vigorously on this day until the evening, especially if concerned with the mechanical pursuits or inventions; deal with military men, machinists, surgeons, tanners, and electricians; make experiments with chemicals and with electrical apparatus; have care in the late afternoon in all real estate dealings which are best deferred for a season.

29—Tuesday. Be up betimes and waste no moments of this day; bright and prosperous are the conditions for the commercial world and for money transactions of magnitude. REGULUS advises his friends to improve every moment; buy goods for trade; engage in new enterprises and deal with banks, judges, counsellors and traders in wool and woolens.

30—Wednesday. Continue thy vigorous prosecution of business during this day until the evening; have money transactions in the forenoon when also crowd every honorable undertaking; the evening is baffling and disappointing.

A safe, simple home treatment that cured me after years of suffering with uterine troubles, displacements, leucorrhœa, etc., sent free to ladies with full instructions for use. Address Mrs. L. Hudnut, 222, South Bend, Ind.

31—Thursday. Disputes are likely to mar the events of the early morning unless the tongue be held well under control; the day is to be avoided for any kind of a matrimonial contract and the artistic and dramatic pursuits are all "under a ban" for a season; expect no favor from the fair sex nor from thy dealings in artistic or decorative wares.

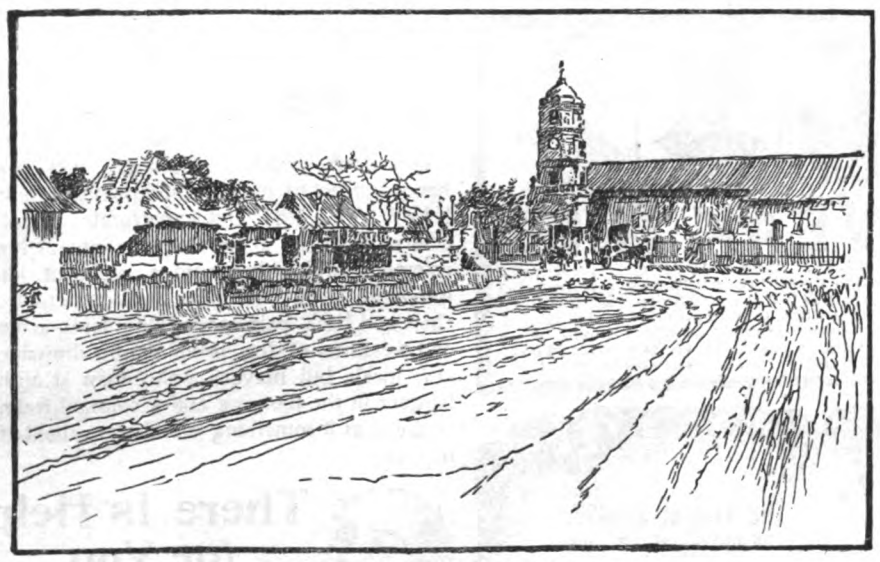
PROFESSOR SCHURMAN.

The detachment of Admiral Dewey from the Asiatic station and the appointment of Rear Admiral Watson in his place, will not bring any change in the intentions of the Government toward the insurgents. It is unfortunate that Admiral Dewey is obliged to come home leaving any questions unsettled, for our own people, as well as the Filipinos, believe him a man of broad mind and one who will always do as he says. With three civilians appointed by the President, Admiral Dewey and General Otis formed the Philippine Commission, Professor John Gould Schurman, a man of fine mind, is its President. The Filipinos have sent several commissions to treat with the Commision; but so far as General Otis is concerned they have promptly and continually been met with no terms but those of unconditional surrender.

It is reported in the newspapers that there is friction between the military and civil ends of our Commission; that Schurman by allowing the Filipino envoys to enter Manila to negotiate has given them a standing and encouragement that they should not have had; and that as a consequence they have been lionized by the local residents to such an extent that they now believe themselves much stronger than they are. The Eastern mind has never been able to understand or appreciate toleration, and when it is shown them they invariably look upon such an action as a sign of fear. So it is told that the civilians on the Commission have by encouraging these informal envoys just so far given aid to the enemy and retarded the arrival of peace, which a month ago seemed certain at an early day but is now apparently far off, although the proclamation defining the intentions of our government, issued by the Commissioners is being very well received. Whether or not this information is correct, there has been considerable clamor in certain parts of the press for an instant recall of our envoys.

These emissaries which were sent by General Luna to General Otis for terms and to request a cessation of hostilities, came from his army beyond Calumpit, which our readers will remember was one of the stands of Aguinaldo as a capital and where an army of 20,000 men were gathered and were driven from as strong entrenchments as could be devised. Two or three sets of these envoys came into our lines, but each time were found to have no definite authority but were simply messengers. Many wild rumors have been in circulation that Luna and Pinar del Rio, the insurgent generals, had deposed Aguinaldo from command. It is evident, however, that General Luna is the man most looked up to by the Filipino people at the present time. So many stories are told the Filipinos that many of them still believe the Americans are really being beaten and driven from the islands. As all of our own news is censored, it is often difficult to get at the exact meaning and intention of many episodes, which come to us in more or less distorted shape. It seems certain as the days go by and we learn more and more of our new accessories, that enough has happened around Manila in the past two months to do away with any idea that the Filipinos are fit to carry on any kind of civilized independent government. They have no grasp on the principles necessary for a modern nationality. They are vain Malay people whose reasons are controlled by impulsive passions and are complete savages in warfare. They leave burning villages and famine behind them in their constant retreat, depriving their own people of shelter and food, and by their foolish action creating no impediment to the conquering Americans. In all probability the crimes of murder, theft and illegal lust precede that of arson and wanton destruction. To rob and destroy the homes of their own kindred is the Togal character, which at best is vengeful, treacherous, cruel and avaricious. Let us hope that there will be no more sentimental talk of turning over the sovereignty of these islands to the natives heard, not even in the streets of Boston which has been the center of "anti-Imperialistic" views. Such a result, if conceivable, would be an everlasting blot on this great country and an evidence before the world of its unworthiness to ask cessions and the relinquishment of existing sovereignty in any place, no matter what set of circumstances might have given us the right to demand it.



The situation in Samoa does not seem to change. A Commission representing the three powers, America, Great Britain and Germany has sailed for the islands and will act after a thorough investigation. All accounts show that the English and Americans have acted together in the difficulties even to standing together in the hand to hand fights. Notwithstanding stories coming from European sources to the contrary the administration has stood behind Admiral Kautz. It is somewhat a matter of regret that the Philadelphia has been ordered homeward, but the Newark, which was designated to relieve her is about as strong a ship. The Germans protest against this vessel being sent to Apia, as we already have a couple of auxiliary cruisers there. It is claimed that a stronger American force will make the insurgent Samoans restive.

One of the most noticeable events of the month was the departure of the flagship Olympia from Manila, homeward bound, bearing Admiral Dewey. As the great ship left the harbor salute after salute rang out from forts and the shipping of all nations. The scene is reported as having been intensely thrilling from its wild enthusiasm. As the cruiser disappeared in the distance signals of good cheer flew over every ship. The first stop was Hong Kong where the Olympia was docked and painted. Admiral Dewey is ill from the strain of the year past and the voyage home will be leisurely. Probably no living man has met with such ovations as will hail him. The English ports will be particularly jubilant on account of the Anglo-American good intent which prevails and this will prove an agreeable way to show good feeling. While no definite itinerary has been given out, the Olympia will arrive in New York about October 1st, and the grandest reception given the Admiral that ever met a conquering hero. Already preparations on a magnificent scale are being made in the metropolis.

In Cuba events are slowly progressing which will bring the people into closer relations with the States. Gen. Gomez has assisted our military Governor in the distribution of the $3,000,000 appropriated for payment of Cuban soldiers. For some time it looked as if none of them were willing to turn in their arms. Gen. Gomez was repudiated by the soldiers and ex-officers were particularly fierce in their threats. Gen. Brooke, however, firmly went ahead and upon his signifying his intention to return the money to the United States, the Cubans tumbled over each other in haste to obtain the $75 per man. The better class of Cubans and Spaniards see the progressive steps of our government and how much is being done for the island's welfare and appreciate it, and are readily adapting themselves to the new conditions. Our postal service, schools and honest administration of public office are revelations to them. If trouble arises it will come from the lazy, thieving half-breeds and full-blooded negroes who were formerly slaves. A wholesome lesson, which is sure to come at no very distant date, to show the strength of America is something that COMFORT trusts President McKinley will not hesitate to administer when necessary. This class of individuals are mentally unable to appreciate toleration and respect nothing but actual brute force.

GENERAL LUNA.

PLAZA AND CHURCH, CALUMPIT.

In our new island of Porto Rico nothing new has transpired. Once in a while some sensational paper announces a contemplated rebellion of the discontented; but the official reports and interviews indicate that the new government is giving great satisfaction. In all our new islands the courts are being continued on the old basis and changes are being made slowly and with care, but the schools, improvements and the safety and liberty of the individual are all so stamped with the idea of progress that none but the vicious, ignorant and irreconcilables are in any way opposed to a fair trial of American methods.

Diplomatic relations between Spain and the United States which came to an end April 23, 1898, when Senor Polo departed from Washington, were renewed at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of June 3rd this year, when Duc d'Arcos, the newly accredited Spanish minister, presented his credentials to President McKinley at the White House. He was received by the President with a cordially dignified manner and the usual exchange of pleasant wishes took place. There is no doubt Spain's selection is a fortunate one, as the Duke has before resided in this country and has a very large number of warm friends. In spite of the fact that the two countries have been at war with each other, there has never been any active dislike of Spanish individuals here, and this will make D'Arcos' mission pleasant and successful.

At the Hague in Holland has met the World's Peace Conference. It will be recalled that about a year or less ago, the Czar asked for a conference of representatives from all nations to consider questions of disarmament and peace. While it seems to COMFORT some of the topics are very visionary at the present time, there is no doubt that many things will come up for discussion which will make war less terrible. The British and Americans appear to be moving on the same general lines relative to arbitration and other questions.

The conference contains some of the most progressive and careful statesmen in the world, and while not all that might be hopedfor universal peace will be accomplished, much advance in the interests of humanity when nations are engaged in war will be made.

Among the modern signs of the times have been the pleasant demonstrations of American good will on the Queen's birthday, May 24th. Many celebrations in connection with our English cousins took place that day. This cordial intent is also shown in an agreement between the two nations just about to be made public, by which a temporary boundary line between British America and Alaska has been defined to exist for two years, during which a definite line is to be established. This takes away one of the most troublesome questions existing between ourselves and will tend to make an earlier agreement relative to vexed questions on our mutual commercial relations with Canada.

This month's article cannot be closed without once more referring to the Philippines. On the whole the situation is comparatively good. Aguinaldo has declared himself a dictator, but his army is slowly crumbling away and as we have always predicted, turning into guerillas. The civilian part of the commission has concluded the natives still need a severe lesson before peace can come; so Gen. Otis will be no longer hampered by their negotiations. The President is to send large reinforcements sufficient in strength to crush out opposition. The later reports show that the form of government offered the Filipinos by the Commission closely resembles that of our territories. The plan offered has a Governor-General appointed by the President, also judiciary. The Governor is to choose his own cabinet, which will be supported by an advisory council chosen by the people. Heads of departments, judges and the higher offices may be Americans or Filipinos or both.

In conclusion we can record that the Cubans are generally accepting the situation together with the money sent from this country. There are some rumors that there will ultimately be an uprising, but it is easier to threaten than act. The threat is: Independence or incendiary fires all over the island. The latest mails and advices show that the new school plan goes into effect in Porto Rico July 1st. By its wise provisions new free public schools are to be maintained in all parts of the island. The system devised by Mr. John B. Easton, Superintendent of schools, contemplates educating all persons between the ages of 6 and 18 years. These schools are to be open at least nine months in the year and will be supported by public taxation. It is hoped and believed that the natives will rapidly avail themselves of this means to make themselves better men and better citizens.

IF two persons, from the fact of having met before, might dispense with the ceremony of introduction, in nine cases out of ten the readers of COMFORT would not need a word of preface from me, but would be content with my story at once; in fact, I shall do so, after a brief description of myself, not as I am, but as it is usually my wont to appear in public.

Are you living in the country? Then the chances are that at a not remote hour you may have seen prowling about the neighborhood a man who might have been a tramp, an ex-pugilist, a dog stealer—any one or all of these, as his dress would present such a strange combination as to utterly confound your attempt to guess the particular grade to which the stranger belonged—that man was Detective Clue.

Are you a resident of the city, who know the faces of those whom you meet during your walks in the streets and in the parks? If so, you may have seen a man who has puzzled you—a "swell," faultlessly "got up" as to dress, with a profuse yet quiet display of jewelry, and you may have noticed that, whilst he apparently participated in the pleasures of the gay crowd of idlers, his eye was restless, and failed not to scan the features of every masculine and feminine face that passed him, and this, too, without the slightest approach to rudeness; and your keen eye detected that his jewelry was paste, and you could not, do what you would, "make the man out"—he was Detective Clue.

If your business has ever carried you through the slums, you may have noticed a man who did not know what to do with himself, so to speak, hanging around the door of a public house or saloon. He did not trouble you much, however; you simply said to yourself: "Some poor fellow out of work." But you were mistaken—he was Detective Clue.

You have, I presume, traveled by rail and found your vis-a-vis an affable loquacious old gentleman, who rested his palm on the handle of a stout cane or umbrella, whilst he quietly scrutinized and bandied an inoffensive joke with each passenger.

Perhaps, dear reader, it has also been your lot to see this same agreeable old gentleman condescend to a sudden fit of seriousness as he whispered something in the ear of one of the occupants of the passenger car who was going to alight. This may have surprised you, but what followed this strange movement, gave you a clue to the mystery—you witnessed an altercation, followed by the sharp click of handcuffs, and you knew that he was Detective Clue.

To begin then—Detective Clue and I are one and the same person.

Some time ago I was obliged to visit the Gulf Coast of Florida, to work up, if possible, some smuggling cases, it having come to the ear of the Department that a large quantity of contraband cigars were being brought to this country from Havana.

Fortunately I had a pretty accurate description of the craft used by the contrabandists, who always landed their goods in an obscure cove, near St. Andrew Bay, and conveyed them by wagons to Evergreen, Alabama, from which point they were shipped to all parts of the country and disposed of.

After traveling second-class, yet by the fastest trains, I arrived upon my ground, so to speak, of course, where I suspected the fountain head of the mystery lay.

I felt rather confident of success, and for a few days after my arrival, I drifted aimlessly from street to street, from saloon to saloon, from shop to shop, and along the dingy pier and sunlit beach, forming acquaintances, learning the town, and talking frequently, of myself and others, and of my half-wild life, afloat and ashore, until I become generally know as "Dark Dan," the sailor—for such was the unremarkable disguise I had chosen to assume on this occasion—and was soon regarded as an open-handed, careless tar, lawless, perhaps, reckless certainly, but a good fellow nevertheless; and this point gained, my plans were soon formed.

I soon elicited the fact that one Don Manarez, an old and wicked-eyed Spaniard, who dealt in "black-strap" Madeira cigars and fruit was the "fence" of the smugglers, and to him I applied one dusky evening as we sat chatting—I had, of course, duly formed his acquaintance—beneath the shadow of the mission dome in the open piazza in front of Manarez's door, for a purchase of Havana cigars.

"Don, old man, ye're a bit wonderin' no doubt, why I came up here, eh?" I quizzed, knocking the ashes from the tip of a fine Havana cigar he had given me. "Truth now, old man, am I right?"

The Spaniard admitted as much and smiled; and what a smile—a wrinkled, toothy smile.

"See here, old boy," I continued "I'll tell ye. I'm just what I appear—a sailor, but I've a reason for being here—see? It's this way; an old chap, who is a friend of mine, is a cigar dealer in Boston, an' he asked me, as I was comin' South, to see what could be done down this way. Understand? Now, Don, I'm on the 'buy;' say fifty thousand first-class I would go the 'yellow.' Do you know of any fellow who has some stock to sell?"

The old Spaniard eyed me sharply for a few moments; then drew nearer and said:

"Yes, meet me at the head of La Shark at sunrise, and I'll show you some goods. 'Tis cash; my friend is poor."

"Cash it is, old boy," said I. "My friend is wheat, he is—he's good for a large plantation, an' knows a good cigar."

"Si senor."

And so we parted.

La Shark was the title of a narrow inlet which pierced the land between the high, rocky walls, three miles up the coast. It was a wild, lonesome spot, where the tide rose and fell with sudden fury, and where storms howled with a fearful force. At ebb, a little beach might be seen upon either shore, beneath the beetling cliff; but at a storm the waves lashed the very walls themselves.

We met promptly, and the result of the interview was the purchase by me of ten thousand cigars, which were at once boxed and shipped to "my friend" in Boston. In due time a second purchase was made, then a third. The Don became communicative as his greed was satisfied, and forgot his prudence, speaking freely of his friends who supplied the goods, until I had learned much of the habits and number of the gang I was pursuing. One thing, however, I had still to learn; their place of meeting and rendezvous. Without this knowledge I could do but little, and I sought it long and earnestly.

However, one dark and threatening morning, as I sat awaiting the coming of the Don at the old place of meeting, pondering on this question, he appeared, and, after a lengthy conversation, led me to their retreat. Half an hour after my entrance into the rendezvous, which proved to be a cave, eight brawny sun-tanned men, all heavily armed, half of them ruffians by their faces, the others worse, headed by Blackbeard their captain, a bronze giant, with an eye like a hawk and a lion-like mane of hair hanging upon his shoulders and breast, also entered.

The Don introduced me as an old customer and as a new friend, and I was received graciously as a matter of course, although with evident caution, especially on the chief's part. He took a dislike to me; and, later, as I sat before the open fire—for it was rather chilly—drinking and smoking, I felt that beneath the careless words and the half welcome given me, there lingered distrust so dread and ferocious that a single misstep would mean instant death and I shuddered and was wary.

It was nearing midnight when a half dozen more of the smugglers arrived—among them Spaniards and Mexicans—and it lacked but little of day when they sought repose. Among them I lay, and wearied both physically and mentally, notwithstanding the strangeness and danger of my surroundings, I slept.

The hours passed and the day came again, but it was not until the sun rose high in the heavens that I awoke. As my eyes opened and fell upon the freebooters nearby, and as I strove to rise I found myself securely bound hand and foot. I was a prisoner. My heart snnk.

Blackbeard, the chief, strode to my side.

"Ye're tied, ye sneaking hound! Ye snake! ye spy! Ye're tied, but we'll ontie ye, by-an'-by."

Ominous words. I shuddered.

"And why?" I queried, "why?"

"Why? Ye know, ye cursed dog! Why? Look at this an' mahap, ye kin recon'," and thrusting his hand beneath his shirt, he drew something forth and held it up before me.

It was my detective badge.

"One o' the boys seen that in your shirt last night, an' we took care o' it. I know what it is an' the boys hev cast a lot, an' ye die at noon—see!"

Without a word he turned away. For a few moments I could scarcely breathe. Then slowly my heart began to work again. It was but little time now for I must die at noon.

Time passed, as time will, and at length Blackbeard and three of his men appeared at my side.

"Snake, the sun's high, an' the boys have decided how to launch ye."

The men lifted me up, carried me to a stretcher near at hand, and laid me upon it. Then one produced a keg marked "Powder," and another put a long fuse into the open bung.

"The boys didn't want ye to go off common like, ye see, so they have filled this."

I made no sign.

"We'll giv' ye a room whar there's a fine view of La Shark, an' hev ye think o'er your past life for a couple of hours or so—see? The match will last that long," he added.

The ruffians lifted me upon the stretcher—my bier that was to be—and bearing me through a long and winding passage deposited me at last in a small, tomb-like space, opening by a low archway directly above the water. Here they placed me and deposited the powder keg beneath me; and then one lighted the snake-like fuse.

"By-bye, ye scum o' the sea!" said Blackbeard. "Compose yourself; it's a quick death. By-bye!"

And the murderers strode from the room.

"Two hours! Oh, God, it is fearful! Why could they not have killed me outright—now?" I had silently moaned.

Then the implacable fate approaching me swept across my brain in one wild, maddening surge, and consciousness fled.

When knowledge returned, I laid half dreaming, over my open grave, noting nothing until a sudden, pungent smell of burning wood entered my nostrils and aroused thought.

Involuntarily I turned my head to learn the cause, when suddenly, with a little crumbling sound, the stretcher sunk at one corner, my body lost its equilibrium and I rolled to the floor. The powder-train, passing close to one leg of the stretcher, had so charred it that it had finally broken.

Writhing like a snake, I managed to throw myself upon the live coals of the still burning wood, where I laid, despite the horrible pain of the fire eating into my flesh, until the cords that bound me were severed. Then, with one mighty effort, I freed myself and sprung to my feet.

Not a moment too soon. The two hours had passed, the slow-match had reached the powder-keg. A fraction of it remained.

I seized the keg, raised it in my arms, rushed through the opening onto the ledge without, and hurled it from me toward the waters of La Shark.

As it descended, bomb-like, through the air, there suddenly shot from behind the point below, the smugglers' craft filled with the freebooting crew—shot forward until directly beneath the falling keg, until the hissing demon struck fairly amidships; then came a roar that shook heaven and, mingled with hoarse cries—a dense cloud of smoke appeared, water shot high into the air filled with debris—then fell again, and quiet reigned; but the smugglers were no more.

"Strike! and Claim the Reward."

I DO not try to explain the story which I am about to tell. I only know that the things happened as I tell them, and that great good came to me as a result. One thing I am sure of; that where once I was accustomed to declare very positively that this thing or that thing must be so and so, I had rather say, now, "I do not know. There is much in life I do not pretend to understand."

I was hurrying back to the office of the Boston——late one afternoon, when I was a reporter for that paper. There had been an accident at the North End. An old building which was being pulled down had accelerated matters by collapsing and burying a number of workmen in the ruins. I had been rushed down there to telephone back to the office if it would be necessary to run an extra, but it had not proved to be much of a story. The contractor was a Portuguese, and the men at work had all been Italians. Several men had been bruised, and two had been killed. The latter had been laid out on the floor of Police Station Number 1, on Hanover street, with a sheet spread over them until their relatives should come to claim the bodies. I reckoned that I could get back to the office, write all the story that would be necessary, and get through in season to go home to supper.

Turning a corner I saw a crowd around a police box. Of course I stopped to see what had happened. The door of the box was open and two officers were holding up an old man between them while they waited for a hurry-up wagon. "Drunk!" I thought to myself, and was going on, when one of the officers made the crowd in front break away, and I happened to get a fair sight of the prisoner. I recognized him at once as a Jewish doctor, or rabbi, whom I had run across in my work not long before.

I had been sent down to the Hebrew quarter of the city, one day, to write up a story about the fidelity which the Jews show to the forms of their religion, especially in the preparation of their food. It was just before some religious feast when it seemed as if every Hebrew family in the city was determined to have a chicken to eat. I found one large building devoted to nothing but trade in fowls—live fowls, cackling and crowing in wooden cages. The Jewish women came and selected what suited them, and then generally held their purchases themselves until they could be killed.

One whole floor was devoted to the killing, and I was allowed to go in and see the ceremony—for I came to feel that this was the only word which properly applied to the process. An old man, tall and thin, with a certain dignity of manner which at first seemed in ill accord with his work, stood at one end of the room, holding a long glistening knife. A fowl was passed out to him by an attendant. Turning the head of the victim deftly, so that the throat was bared, one stroke of the knife sent the red blood flowing into a shining basin beneath. In a moment the requisition of the old Mosaic law had been satisfied, and the fowl was passed on to be plucked, paid for and carried home. As I watched the flash of the knife, and studied the man's face, I came to feel that this was for him not a mere butchery. He was a priest of the Law, as much as were those of whom the Bible tells, 5000 years ago. Later I had a chance to talk with him. He was a Polish Jew, come to this country to escape persecution. Life had not been easy for him, here, I judged. If I understood him he was not a rabbi, but only a doctor, not licensed to preach but merely do such work as this. I found him interesting, and thought then I would look him up again, sometime, and get a story for the Sunday edition, but I never got around to do it.

This was the man I saw between the two policemen. Those in the crowd were laughingly talking about his "jag," but I did not believe he had been drinking. John Gerry, one of the officers who held him, was a good friend of mine. He told me they had found the old man insensible in a doorway. That was all. They let me ride to the Station House with him. I knew he had no family, and from what I could tell them there about him the Captain

IS IT A TRIFLE?

That Common Trouble, Acid Dyspepsia, or Sour Stomach.

Now Recognized as a Cause of Serious Disease.

Acid dyspepsia, commonly called heartburn or sour stomach, is a form of indigestion resulting from fermentation of the food. The stomach being too weak to promptly digest it, the food remains until fermentation begins, filling the stomach with gas, and a bitter, sour, burning taste in the mouth is often present. This condition soon becomes chronic, and being an everyday occurrence, is given but little attention. Because dyspepsia is not immediately fatal, many people do nothing for the trouble.

Within a recent period a remedy has been discovered, prepared solely to cure dyspepsia and stomach troubles. It is known as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and is now becoming rapidly used and prescribed as a radical cure for every form of dyspepsia.
